We need to push the administration to stand up for its noble ideals by helping them improve their common sense and conviction. So by all means increase the variables in the admissions application. Make concessions for disadvantaged white students. But that doesn't have to push out consideration of racial disadvantage. In fact, go ahead and make more spaces for racial/ethnic minority students as well. Why should this be cut if the objective is only to modify procedures to avoid race/ethnicity as the main criteria? This campus is big enough for a few more students, and it won't hurt to hire more faculty either.

The Chancellor has declared a "Marshall Plan for education in the knowledge age." Inspiring words, but let's not forget that the Marshall Plan only rebuilt Western Europe — not the rest of the world that had been ravaged by four centuries of European imperialism. So let's make sure the Chancellor's Marshall Plan is more inclusive than its eponymous predecessor and make it work.

Yes, I believe that by supporting the Chancellor's innate humanity we can actually make this nationwide revolution about diversity happen, beginning right here in UMass. We must build constituencies here and on other campuses: perhaps we can help the Chancellor heal his fellow Chancellors elsewhere as well.

For starters, we must tell the administration to stop quaking about "ill-winds" and "climates" that are threatening affirmative action and instead do some weather-making of our own. Meanwhile, if a silly lawsuit comes our way, we'll kick its butt right here. We'll think of something. Surely, the administration of a fine university like ours should be able to find enough ideas from its enormous pool of students, staff, faculty, and parents. Will it, and they will come.

But first, the respected Chancellor has to get out from under his bed.

Letters to the Editor

Red tape is childish

To the editor:

Why is it so hard to get anything accomplished administratively here? When was the last time you went to housing with a problem they could fix but wouldn't? How many times have you been to the Bursar's office to prove that you paid your bills for the tenth time?

Each and every thing we students try to get things done through Whitmore, it takes way more effort than really needed. If a student submits a request, it usually bounces off the red tape and is discarded. On a few rare occasions, that request might make it through the red tape and into what is commonly known as B.S., where it is lost forever.

For example, for a student with fewer than 54 credits to get off the University meal plan, they must file for an exemption. If the exemption is wanted for medical reasons, a physician's diagnosis is required. Once the forms are sent to Dining Services, they are supposedly reviewed and typically denied. So, if you really do get sick from D.C. food and a doctor says you get sick from D.C. food, why is it that Dining Services will not allow such a student off the meal plan?

The bureaucracy here is insanely childish, asinine and flat out disgusting. Instead of dealing with the hassles of Whitmore, why doesn't the University just bulldoze the building and erect a giant sign saying, "No" in its place? This would be just as effective and personable as the current system but would cost less.

To the administration: give us students a break every once in a while. Believe it or not, we're actually people too.

Over-population in the U.S.

To the Editor:

Two weeks ago, one hundred eighty nations gathered in the Netherlands to discuss the future of our planet and its almost six billion human inhabitants. In 1994, these nations reached a historical agreement, called the Cairo Program of Action. This states that the way to stabilize population is to provide universal access to affordable family planning services and to empower women to make life choices other than simply being mothers.

Cairo+5, as this conference is called, is a chance to take stock and see how close we are to achieving the Cairo Program of Action.

Cairo+5 demonstrated that attitudes toward women and family size are changing in developing nations, but also that developed nations must meet the financial commitments set forth in the original Cairo conference. Currently, population policy is barely a blip on the U.S. political agenda, at a time when more than one billion people — the largest generation of young people in history — are now entering their reproductive years.

The choices that the developed world makes today will determine the progress of the attempt to lower population rates over the last thirty years on two fronts. One method is providing resources for family planning and education programs for women all over the world. The other is by recognizing that ecologically responsible child-bearing is not only a necessity in the developing world, but in the United States as well.

I am part of the Sierra Club of Pioneer Valley Population Committee. Our goal is to educate ourselves and others on the importance of population issues — both on a global scale, and in our own lives. Population growth affects our environment, worldwide quality of life, and our common future. If you would like to join us or just want more information, please give us a call. Population issues are not too large for us to make a substantial difference.

Working 9:05

The most despised evil of all, more hated than Hitler and brussel sprouts, is the 9:05 a.m. class. I regret if Hitler was feeding you brussel sprouts, and you have this necessity of UMass scheduling.

The 9:05 can thus make or break your day. It may be the biggest dilemma of your life... even the biggest dilemma of the universe and God.

Do you wake up in the wee hours of the morning, or sleep for one more hour? Or perhaps the whole semester?

This decision ranks among The Biggest Questions of All Time, replacing old Big Questions like "Life — what's the deal?", "Humans — still a good idea?", and "Super-sizing — c'mon, really that super?"

It's interesting how the alarm clock can make such a big impact on this question, interrupting our splendorous sleep with the most annoying sound in the world. Plus, if you're like me, you're dumb and sometimes set the alarm for p.m. instead of a.m. All of this clumsiness would be solved if we just had one nation-wide alarm for everyone, or a big giant rooster.

Bryan McAllister

It's a known fact that it's just impossible to wake up in the morning. There are some exceptions to this rule, and they mostly involve sex.

Of course, as you go through life, your view on sleep differs greatly. As a kid, you didn't mind waking up in the morning. The day was never long enough. You're up at 4 a.m., watching "Voltron" and playing with Transformers. On Christmas Day, sleep is not an option at all.

There must be some sort of scientific explanation for this, but one possible reason is that kids are insane. But I wish science would come up with some kind of way to harness this energy in kids, and then give it to us adults through some sort of side-effect-inducing pill. But they're too busy wasting their time on cancer and AIDS research. Punks.

Meanwhile, you move to high school and adolescence, and you begin to hate most parts of life. Suddenly, you can't get out of your house without coffee, and all you want is your bed back. This is why sex is so popular in high school — it involves our two most unquenchable desires, the opposite sex and a bed.

Which brings us to college, where those desires are for practical reasons, focused on the opposite sex entirely. In this phase, sleep hardly occurs at all.

So when sleep is available, in those wee hours of the morning, it's very hard to sit in a cramped chair for an hour and listen to a lecture. And what if you fall asleep during the lecture? Essentially, you've just woken up to leave your bed and go sleep in a chair. Dumb, if you ask me.

The key to surviving 9:05's is taking naps, but often these naps are interrupted by large amounts of bad singing and sex, or bad sex and singing. This is why, in addition to a national wake-up call, we should have a national nap time. This is like tea time in Britain, except without any of that tea crap. And it would certainly make that 9:05 easier to get to.

Of course, the 9:05 class can also come in handy. For instance, if you're a girl, and you don't want some guy to stay over, clearly the best excuse is, "I have a 9:05... sorry." What is ironic about this is that after that guy leaves, that same girl will go to her cooler guy friend and say, "I have a 9:05, but screw it, give me a beer."

That 9:05 class never amounts to anything important, anyway. By the time everyone actually trickles in, it's 9:20. Then there's the inevitable Microphone Theory, which states that a professor's microphone will never work, ever. This also applies to all audiovisual equipment. Also, Crystal Pepsi.

What's intriguing about the early morning lecture, though, is the different ways the sexes deal with it. Say, for instance, the professor announces, "It's Thursday, February 25."

The common girl response to this is to write every single word down, including the quotation marks, and with a cute little heart above the I.

The common guy response is, "Dude, isn't it November?"

"No, it's February, man."

"Well, it sure feels like November."

Of course, guys are always convinced that someone has screwed with the months, and whoever it is, they better fess up soon, or it won't be pretty. Personally, I'm sure it's the Egyptians' fault.

Incidentally, I also blame the 9:05 on the Egyptians.

And if you have an 8:00 class, man, I don't envy you. Thanks, Egyptians.

Consul General to give speech this afternoon

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Translating the peace process into comprehensible terms, the Consul General of Israel to New England will speak to the University community this afternoon.

COURTESY OF CONSULATE GENERAL OF ISRAEL TO NEW ENGLAND

Consul General Itzhak Levanon will speak this afternoon.

Itzhak Levanon, who has served as Consul General for the past two years, will bring his experience in the field of foreign affairs to his lecture, "Painting the Political Landscape: Ramifications of the Peace Process."

The lecture will be held at 4 p.m. at the Hillel House.

Given that "Israel is at a critical crossroads right now in terms of the peace process," the lecture is particularly timely, Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter said.

Levanon has also served with Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs in New York, Venezuela, Colombia and Paris, and was a member of the Israeli delegation to the peace talks in Washington, D.C.

Since 1997, Levanon has been the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Jerusalem's representative to the Monitoring Group for Lebanon.

He has also served as the Director of the North Africa and Lebanon Department of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Jerusalem, and as Consul General in Montreal.

Levanon's lecture is part of the ongoing "Israel at 50" series and is funded in part by the Harold Grinspoon Supporting Foundation.

A Search for Truth in the Jewish Tradition

In our times, we find the vast majority of Jewish youth disillusioned by and therefore spiritually estranged from their heritage. Our peers often experience lingering ethnic and cultural attachments, but as for a comprehensive system of spirituality, they find nothing but meaningless rituals whose purpose has long since been antiquated. A state such as this can never lead to a vibrant, thriving Jewish future. The solution, then, is to reclaim what has been lost. To rediscover the essence of this 3,000-year-old way of life and reveal the eternal significance of the ideas and practices which define us as a people. The column you are about to read and all that follow it are dedicated to that goal.

Before I can address specific precepts, practices or excerpts from scripture within the Jewish tradition, (which I plan to do in later editions of this column) I think it is important first to lay down a general framework of Jewish thought.

First, probably the most essential question relates to God. Most of us picture God and see a large old man with a long beard. Of all misconceptions this is perhaps the worst. Without even addressing the very act of "picturing" God, let us first examine the idea of gender. Gender as we know it is a phenomenon limited to this world. God is neither male nor female. Rather, in order to understand God to the best of our abilities we organize ways in which God manifests in this world into "male" and "female" energies. These energies represent, respectively, the concepts of "giving energy" and that of "receiving energy," not that God is actually a humongous, invisible male or female who manipulates us unsuspecting humans.

Next, we ask how and why does God relate to this world, which ties directly into why we perform mitzvot (commandments). This subject is a massive one to which justice cannot be done even in thousands of books, let alone a paragraph; yet I will attempt a consolidation. The very concept of God "relating" to a world is a misnomer. I want to begin this idea with an illustration: A magnet has two poles, without one of these poles it is no longer a magnet. When we apply this concept to God, we can say that existence is categorized into "being" (physically) and non- being "spirituality." God is manifest completely in each one of these, as magnetism is manifest completely in each pole of a magnet. Therefore we don't relate to God, but are an intrinsic part of God. Then why do mitzvot? Here I relate another illustration: We all have bodies, each part of the body has a special job, contributing to the whole in a way which only it can; there is a flux in which it nourishes the rest of the body through its action and is in turn nourished by the rest of the body. Moreover, the body and the organ are one, for the organ is a part of the body as a whole. In application we can understand that performing any mitzvah is a way of tapping into the flow of godliness throughout existence. We are an "organ," which performs a specific task whereby it establishes a mutually "nourishing" link of oneness with God, with existence. This is not a punishment or a limitation, but rather the best way of achieving freedom, and every nation is capable in their own way of having that freedom.

Hayyim Rothman

The final topic for this edition concerns the study of Torah (Jewish scripture). This is a topic which encompasses all of the above and is especially pertinent to future editions of this column. The rabbis tell us that "God, the Torah and Israel are one." What does this mean? Jews are not God, a book is not Jews and God is neither of them. We must look deeper. The Torah is not only God's will, but also an expression of God's essence, as the rabbis teach us, "learn over and over again for everything is in it." Acting in concurrence with the "magnet theory" of existence related above, the Torah is something in which the finite is infinite and the infinite is finite. Therefore the link between God and God's Torah is established. Following this, the Jews are the practical application of the precepts elucidated in the Torah. We can say that we as a people are the physical manifestation of the ideas read in scripture. This is not to say that gentiles are any less of God, but that Jews are obligated by all the precepts of the Torah, which gentiles are not; this is not a qualitative difference, but one of task (we are different "organs" with different responsibilities). Based on all of this, when a Jew studies Torah with the proper intention, s/he is "plugged into" the very essence of their being, of existence, of God. This is a meditation of supreme degree. Such an experience I wish both for my readers and for myself, together I hope we can grow closer to it as we study together.

A Message from the Board

The new Jewish Student Union/Hillel Board, which was elected at the end of last semester, has set out to tackle a few concerns that students have recently voiced. One issue is the low turnout for some of the events that were planned last semester. Students have also expressed concern that the events that are successful usually consist of the same people, and very few new students show up.

Many students said that low turnout might be due to an uninviting environment and a crowd that isn't hospitable to new people. As a response, board members have voiced that their top priorities should be to bring in new members as well as to bring a friendly atmosphere to the events.

Natty Yagudin

One of the solutions is to plan fewer and larger programs, so that energy and resources will pour into a few very successful events rather than inadequate numerous ones. Also, board members are sensitive to planning our future programs in a way that will make newcomers feel welcomed.

A major issue is trying to expand Jewish awareness not only among Jewish students, but also across campus. Last semester, there weren't any substantial responses to occurrences of anti-Semitism around Amherst. Some of the programs that are being planned with the intent of marking a stronger Jewish presence within the University community include an interracial Passover Seder, a campus-wide Holocaust Remembrance Week and an Israel Independence Day program.

The board would like to see more participation and initiative on the part of students from the University community. It is more efficient for the board to oversee the planning of programs, rather than have to coordinate all the programs themselves. As a partial solution to this problem, a decision has been made to move the Jewish Student Union meetings from the Hillel House to the Campus Center starting in March.

The board hopes that the move will spark a larger turnout at the meetings, especially from students who are not as comfortable coming to the Hillel House.

It is very important, however, that students who are interested in planning a program inform the board of their plans, so that confusion and a waste of resources will not take place. Past experiences have shown that working with the board has produced much stronger programs.

Natty Yagudin is a Jewish Student Union/Hillel board member.

New Jewish Reform group new options for campus life

By Morgan Tabor
Collegian Staff

The plans for a Reform religious group are underway, offering diverse options for religious observance here on the campus of the University of Massachusetts.

In the fall of 1998, Rabbi Jonathan Klein lead a Reform Friday night service. Klein is part of Kesher, a national movement that grants funding, offers scholarships and is a resource for students in order to keep Reform practice alive on college campuses nationwide.

Klein's service sparked the interest of two freshman UMass students, Jeff Perlman and Rebecca Russel. Both students are Reform Jews and felt a void when it came to observance here at UMass.

"We are not trying to compete with what's in place, but trying to supplement it," said Russel.

Perlman and Russel were avid participants in religious youth groups in high school and were looking for that connection here at college. They wanted to open up opportunities to other fellow students who might share similar feelings. They developed their Reform group to offer students an alternative observance option to the already existing conservative and egalitarian services.

Along with offering religious service options, the group also plans on coordinating social events and functions.

The construction of the Reform religious group has been unfolding within the past few weeks with the guidance of Hillel's Program Director, David Arfa.

They will be holding Reform services the last Friday of every month, offering students another option for religious observance. This upcoming Friday will be their first service, led by a group of people who helped with the development of the group. The service will begin at 6 p.m. in the Hillel House.

The Monday before Passover, March 29th, is the group's first organized annual event, the Pre-Passover Kesher Kick- off Buena Y Sano Buffet or PPKKBB. This event will be held at the Hillel House and will offer food, friends and fun. There is no cost and for more information check Hillel's monthly calendar or contact the Hillel House at 549-1710.

When is being Jewish enough?

Being Jewish is not easy in today's society, especially on this campus. We each have to do our best to stay in touch with our religion, whatever it may be. Each individual has his or her own way of being spiritual. I personally feel in touch with Judaism when I pray, sing Jewish songs and learn new information about my religion.

Jaclyn Sobel

Although people may not agree with my style of observance, I still practice in my own way. I love praying because I feel so connected to God. Yet, my favorite kinds of services are those that have a lot of singing and sometimes, some guitar-playing. Many people have problems with this since they do not feel it is appropriate to sing certain tunes and play instruments while praying. I am not saying there is a right or wrong way to pray; it is just a matter of your own interpretation.

I wish I could practice my religion as I so choose. I do not criticize others on their religious rituals. Why should I be criticized? Yes, I am a Reform Jew. Did you know that I do not go to a Reform temple? I go to a Conservative shul. There they do not count women as part of a minyan (number of people required for a prayer service), they do not allow women on the bima (pulpit) and they have sections so you may sit separate from the opposite sex. However, I still believe that women should be included in prayer services. Does being a Reform Jew make me a bad Jew?

Does it make me not a Jew?

We are all Jews. Why should we separate ourselves more than we already are? We are already so isolated from certain areas of the world. Do we need to make it any worse than it already is? It is tough enough living in an assimilated society. How much harder does it have to get before the glass is broken?

I do not want to make it sound as though all Jews are not accepting of other Jews. However, the reality is that people are so critical of others today that we forget where we come from and who we are. The majority of Jewish people are welcoming and respectful of others in their own belief system.

Here on the UMass campus, I feel as though I am an outsider in the Jewish community. I know that I am welcome and I know that I am wanted there. The issue is whether or not I am respected and acknowledged. I do not take exams on Saturday. I do not keep strictly Kosher. I do believe in my religion. I respect all sects of Judaism. I go to services on Friday night. I do not completely keep the Sabbath. I do only date Jewish men. I live in the Jewish Living Community within the Hillel House. I am part of Kesher (the Reform college movement). How much do I have to prove my Jewishness?

I know I do not need to prove anything to myself. Yet, I feel as though I must be more observant in order to meet some people's standards. I have never been a conformist, nor do I plan on starting now. I plan to keep on practicing in my own way. I just wish that people would understand my point of view. If we all just took a few minutes out of the day to reflect on our thoughts, maybe we would be able to understand the points of view of others.

I hope all of you out there think of your beliefs and your criticisms. Think of your religion and how you practice it. Think of your family and friends. Think of other religions and your tolerance of them. Make sure you take into account the minority view.

One last parting question: What makes you feel closer to God (if you believe) and what makes you feel religious?

Northeast a home to Jewish students

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Jewish students on campus often feel isolated from each other and long for a sense of community. A new program on campus aims to build bridges, connecting Jewish students to one another across a diverse, and sometimes overwhelming campus.

The Jewish Residential Area program is filling a gap on- campus Jewish students felt was wide open.

Morry Korinow is the Jewish Residential Area program coordinator in the Northeast Residential Area and is excited about the program's birth.

"It's important for Jews to get to know other Jews on campus," he said, "instead of going out to Hillel, it brings it to them."

Some activities Korinow has organized in the Northeast area are movie nights, a Hannukah party, and sometimes, Korinow said students just "hang out in my room and chat."

And how successful is the new program?

"My last program, the Hanukah party, went great. About 50 people showed up. There were a few smaller programs last semester but the Hanukah party was a great kickoff," he said.

Batia Charpak, a freshman Northeast resident, said she has met several people through the program.

"I've met people who I never even knew they were Jewish before," she said.

"A lot of Jewish students on campus are scared by the word 'Hillel.' [In this program] they don't have to go so far and it's not such a scary religious 'thing.'"

Korinow said some future events include a possible Purim celebration.

"I'm hoping to have a big turnout for that. Maybe we'll all go out into town and go to dinner," he said.

The rest of the representatives from the residential areas, said Korinow, meet weekly or bi-weekly to share ideas.

Central Residential Area Coordinator, Naomi Dovdavany, has also had some successful programs this semester, and hopes to create a buzz for future events.

"I had an ice-cream sundae making party and I'm also very enthusiastic about Israeli dance," Dovdavany said. "Of course I also had a Hanukah party.

"We will be having a hamentashen baking party for Purim and there is going to be a pre-Passover pizza party."

Director of Hillel, Saul Perlmutter, said he is also enthusiastic about the Jewish Residential Area Program.

"It's great! It's students working with students right where students live," he said.

"The students are enjoying the prospect of meeting people who live right near them."

Perlmutter emphasized that the residence programs aren't in place of events at Hillel, but compliment them.

Some residence halls began programming like this before there was an official campus-wide program set up, said Perlmutter. Orchard Hill Residential Area offered israeli dancing programs last year.

Hillel implemented the program this year, upon receiving a grant from the Jewish Endowment Foundation of Western Massachusetts.

"They gave us a grant for the first year. Now we need to find some more money for next year," Perlmuter said.

"[The Jewish Endowment Foundation of Western Massachusetts] gives grants in decreased amounts for up to three years. In theory we are supposed to find the funding to continue."

Davdavany summed up her feelings about the Jewish Residential Area Program:

"It brings the Jew to you, instead of you going to the Jew!"

Hefner is toe tapping fun

BREAKING GOD'S HEART
Hefner
beggars banquet

Hefner is a band made up of a trio of boys from London. Their music is fresh and clear and contains no artificial fillers, and it's good too. Their sound is like a mix between British pop and Indie rock, or what the lead singer, Darren Hayman, describes as "urban folk." Now, although I'm not really into British pop, Indie rock or urban folk for that matter, I wish I was just because of Breaking God's Heart. Hefner's music is toe tapping, head bobbing, and it should be listened to in the car if driving long distances. Their energetic guitars and drums also keep you humming long after the song is over. If Hefner's music was based on lyrics alone, their tunes would be classified as sappy love songs however, because of their up-beat melodies and ingenious use of contagious choruses, their music is anything but sappy (thank goodness). Breaking God's Heart is a good album. It made an impression on me even though I did not think that I would enjoy it that much. It is definitely a good investment for those looking for a fresh band from England whose sound is original and catchy, but not at all lame. A– (Alexandria Lipka)

HOW TO SURVIVE WITH A BLOWN MIND
Lo-Fidelity Allstars
Columbia

These guys are very British, comparable to the darker sounds of The The and Fatima Mansions. They wouldn't exist without The Prodigy's "Smack My Bitch Up." The Wrekked Train is this collective's vocalist. Get the idea? He comes over best when he drops spoken word bits onto various tracks. Every sound is processed and tracks are constructed from both credited and uncredited sources.

Key tracks include the epic title song with its samples of a female vocalist and "Nightime Story," one of two tracks that make great use of samples from Seventies' sirens, the Three Degrees. B (Matthew Nixon)

THE FACULTY
Music from the Motion Picture
Columbia

The movie from which this soundtrack accompanies is long gone from theaters. It had something to do with a crew of teenagers dressed in Tommy Hilfiger, battling teachers who are actually aliens. This soundtrack's gimmick is several cover versions of classic rock standards. Soul Asylum attempts Alice Cooper's "School's Out" and Creed tackles Cooper's "I'm Eighteen." Shawn Mullins redoes David Bowie's "Changes" and new supergroup Class of '99 takes a shot at Pink Floyd's "Another Brick in the Wall, part II."

It is scary to think that today's teens may think these are the originals. These new versions have a modern rock sheen and Class of '99's track seems all over a certain station around the 99 FM area of the dial. The group includes Alice in Chains' Layne Staley on vocals and Rage Against The Machine's Tom Morello on guitar. It is not a bad song. It is just that they chose a classic as their subject. If some of you even remotely like this version and have not heard The Wall, listen to it now. There is a lackluster tune from Garbage that sounds out of place amongst all the angst. Stabbing Westward represent industrial pop with a catchy ditty with the chorus, "Why are you haunting me?"

There is something for everybody here. Oasis and Sheryl Crow pop up also. The star of the show is Shawn Mullins' "Changes" cover. B (M.N.)

100% COLOMBIAN
Fun Lovin' Criminals
Virgin

Not as inane as their first release, but not as much fun either. The fusion of rock and hip-hop does not work as well here as it has with other bands. The opening track, "Up On the Hill," gives the album some glint of promise, but quickly fizzles out as tracks like "The View Belongs to Everyone" and "Korean Bodega" border on obnoxious. The urban NYC ambience given to the album only contributes to the disc's artificiality. The Fun Lovin' Criminals may have scored a dumb luck hit a couple years ago with "Scooby Snacks," but 100% Colombian is proof that their fifteen minutes are up. D+ (Kevin Monahan)

IMMERSION
Mephisto Waltz
Cleopatra

Not a bad outing for this darkwave band. The first track (the title track) sets the mood right away: mystical and haunting. Lead vocalist Christianna gives the album a dark urethral beauty that carries through all of the disc's 11 tracks. "The Garden of Proserpine" and "The Falcon to the Falconer" are great tunes in line with the mythic concept of the album as do tracks such as, "The Tyger," "Icarus," and "Ode to the West Wind." Easily reminiscent of Switchblade Symphony and Sunshine

Rolling stone stops at Mullins

Bob Dylan will perform at the Mullins Center tonight.

By Mike Messoros

Hey, Robert Zimmerman is coming to town!

Now, don't all jump out of your seats at once. Maybe you know Mr. Zimmerman better as Bob Dylan.

Tonight, he'll be staying here with us, as Dylan brings his Neverending Tour to the William D. Mullins Center.

For a man who once listed in his high school yearbook that his goal was to "join Little Richard," Dylan has carved out a nice little niche for himself. Since being signed to Columbia by the legendary John Hammond (who would later sign Bruce Springsteen to the same label) in 1961, Dylan has been at best revolutionary, and at the least, interesting.

As Bruce Springsteen said when inducting him into the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame, "Bob freed the mind the way Elvis freed the body... He invented a new way a pop singer could sound, broke through limitations of what a recording artist could achieve, and changed the face of rock and roll forever."

The Amherst community gets a great opportunity to see a living legend on the UMass campus. Dylan has been recording for almost four decades. He got his start in New York with the burgeoning folk scene of the early '60s. He came from Duluth, Minn., wanting to follow in the footsteps of his hero, Woody Guthrie. In the end, Dylan ended up serenading Guthrie from his bedside while his hero was hospitalized with a rare illness.

Since those starry eyed beginnings, he's become a

HEMPILATION 2
Free the Weed
Capricorn

This is the second benefit album for the National Organization to Reform Marijuana Law (NORML), sponsored by High Times. The eclectic mix of artists that make up the album is at least amusing. Not all the songs are about weed, but most are.

Mike Watt's "Sidemousin' the Bong" (which features Porno for Pyros/Jane's Addiction drummer Stephen Perkins and ex-That Dog violinist Petra Hayden) and Hank Flamingo's "The Dope Smokin' Song" are a couple of titles to give you the idea. The Rainmakers with Brewer & Shipley's "One Toke Over the Line" is an interesting spin on the original 1971 song, and George Clinton's "U.S. Customs Coast Guard Dope Dog" provides some groove to the novelty of this disc. Letters to Cleo's "Let's Get High" gives a much needed burst of energy to the album, that doesn't last nearly long enough. At 2 minutes, 14 seconds the Cleo's tune is the second shortest track on the album (the shortest track is Vic Chesnutt's "Weed—to the Rescue" clocking in at 1:43). If you're a supporter of NORML buy this disc. If you're not a supporter, buy this disc for the Letters to Cleo song. B+ (K.M.)

member of the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame and was given a lifetime achievement award at the 1991 Grammys. In 1998, he won three Grammys for his album Time Out of Mind and released Live 1966: The "Royal Albert Hall" Concert — The Bootleg Series Vol. 4. In between he's put out some of the most recognizable, intriguing and beautiful music ever recorded such as "Blowin' in the Wind," "Like a Rolling Stone" and "Just Like a Woman."

With the release of Time Out of Mind and Live 1966, Dylan has once again asserted himself as an Important Artist. Time Out of Mind saw him re-honing his craft, stripping himself down only to find a Dylan scared of growing old and being alone. It was a breathtaking reexamination of life for a man who has been close to knockin' on heaven's door more than once.

Live 1966 revisits Dylan at what is possibly his creative peak. The show captured here, a show often bootlegged and passed around by fans, was one of the first he played electric, a huge change for a man who was thought to be the savior of folk. The tour found his fans divided, with half applauding the daring change, while others booed vehemently during the full band numbers. It's a recording that captures rock at it's most glorious and beautiful, ragged and angry. It captures a time when rock mattered.

What can we expect from the former Zimmerman? Nothing usual. Expect to wait until he breaks into his lyrics to recognize what song he's playing. Dylan has a habit of recasting his songs musically — changing his phrasing, speeding it up, slowing it down, changing the key, changing the time. The songs are rarely the same as on record, as he breathes new life into each, revealing new meanings and changing their tone. His concerts can go on for hours, with a set list that's ever-changing.

Natalie Merchant, formerly of 10,000 Maniacs, opens the show.

Bob Dylan and Natalie Merchant will be performing tonight at the Mullins Center at 8 p.m.

DVD online ups movie disk market

By Ric Leyvo
Associated Press

NEW YORK — DVD movie disks are nothing new. Online celebrity chats are even older news. Put them together though, adding loads of behind-the-scenes goodies, and you have a breakthrough. Bypassing the limitations of Internet bandwidth constraints, which prevent quality real-time video feeds, MGM Studios is packing its regular DVD disk of the 1998 John Frankenheimer movie Ronin with extensive additional footage, most of it accessible only via the World Wide Web.

The novel concept will allow film fans and high-tech buffs to take part live in an online event March 14 with Frankenheimer where he'll reveal moviemaking secrets, display storyboard sketches, on-set still photos and much more, accompanied by high-resolution video clips showing what he's talking about.

Starring Robert De Niro and Jean Reno, the "R" rated film set in France is a thriller about international intelligence agents and mercenaries who lost their government jobs at the end of the Cold War. It features some of the best car chase sequences ever filmed.

Frankenheimer, 69, is a living film legend whose credits include The Manchurian Candidate, Seven Days in May, Grand Prix and The Birdman of Alcatraz.

The multimedia marriage of Internet and DVD intrigues Frankenheimer, who admits that although he has witnessed tremendous technical development during his life and is highly computer literate, he remains mystified by the rapid growth of the World Wide Web. To say, "Yes, of course," Frankenheimer said in a telephone interview from Los Angeles "I'm not a great visionary."

In the "Ronin" online event, everything but the video will be transmitted over the Internet, while the clips come from the movie disk to make playback quick and high-quality regardless of modem speed. The clips, encoded so they can be seen only by logging onto MGM's Web site, feature additional footage not used in the film's final edit, behind-the-scenes clips showing how stunts were staged, and a few bloopers outtakes.

A basic description doesn't do it justice. The end result is a rich, visually stunning presentation that feels like a multimedia film school lecture hall, with the professor, Frankenheimer, discussing moviemaking problems and solutions while the film clips show the results.

He's excited by the idea of sharing his work with thousands via the Internet, while recognizing that revealing too many secrets behind movie wizardry can spoil the audience's fun.

"In a way it does bother me, because in another generation and another time I don't think anybody really cared that they shot 'Casablanca' on the Warner Bros. backlot," he said. "It was just a good movie, and it was an illusion. Sometimes it's better not to know how it was done, and just enjoy the magic of it. But that's not the age we live in anymore."

For people who can't resist seeing how directors perform movie magic but can't take part in the live online event, and for those who want to see it again and again, the presentation will be recorded and saved on an Internet server so disk owners can view it anytime.

And all the online access extras included on the disk that hit store shelves yesterday are free.

The disk, which can be used to play the film normally on DVD players and computers equipped with DVD drives, has a list price of about $25, no more than regular DVD movie disks and less than many that, like "Ronin," also offer some extra footage and director commentary that buyers don't need an Internet hookup to view.

It's a first-time effort for MGM that has wide-reaching implications since the studio holds video distribution rights to more than 6,700 other films dating back to the early days of movies, many of which are classics that would be prime candidates for similar combined online-DVD efforts.

The format also could extend far beyond movie marketing, with alternative possible applications including other performing arts, sports, education, business, even military training.

Uniting so many forms of media in a single presentation presents a tantalizing look at the future of multimedia. It may also frighten traditionalists who don't like the Internet and home entertainment centers making inroads into a domain still dominated by the old-fashioned movie theater.

Frankenheimer, however, has no fears about cinema ever becoming obsolete.

"I don't think that's ever going to happen. I think there's something about the group experience, going OUT to see a movie, that's a part of our existence," he said. "And it would be a shame if it did, leaving just total isolation. That whole group experience, I think that's special.

Nomar prepares for season

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Nomar Garciaparra had a sunny greeting for reporters waiting on a cool morning for his first mass interview as the Red Sox undisputed offensive star now that Mo Vaughn is gone.

"How's everybody doing? Good to see you guys all brought the cold weather with you down from Boston," he said. "See you guys."

He feigned a hasty departure, smiled, and stayed for about 20 minutes. He politely answered questions, although he'd just as soon be left alone to focus, as he does so intently, on baseball. He could do that last season when Vaughn was a media magnet after every game. But now the first baseman who hit .337 with 40 homers and 115 RBIs is with the Anaheim Angels. And Garciaparra, the shortstop who hit .323 with 35 homers and 122 RBIs in his second season, should find more reporters around his locker.

"I don't think about it," he said yesterday, the day before Boston's first full-squad workout. "I'm not going to change myself. I've still got a job to do. That's my main concern."

"I'm sure he'll handle whatever comes his way to the best of his ability," manager Jimy Williams said. "You can't please everybody."

Garciaparra is one of just five players to hit at least 30 homers in each of his first two major league seasons and finished second in the AL MVP voting last year.

That success comes from his dedication to his workouts and unchangeable routines that border on superstition, such as his constant fidgeting between pitches.

And he doesn't expect to change anything just because the team leader, Vaughn, left through free agency.

"I don't think anybody can take Mo's spot," Garciaparra said. "Everybody has the same personality they had. Nobody's going to change. There's no need to change and you come out here, you prepare yourself for the season-and you take on the season like any other year."

Like last year, forecasters are discounting the Red Sox as a playoff threat, although last season they had the second best record in the American League to the New York Yankees. Garciaparra scoffs at those predictions.

"Why am I going to waste my energy on that when I know what's going on myself," he said. "I don't need somebody else to tell me who's outside looking in."

He's optimistic the Red Sox can compete in the playoffs even though the Yankees have added former Boston ace Roger Clemens, a development that didn't escape Garciaparra, who said he doesn't keep up with player transactions.

"I think they even put a news report right in the middle of 'Friends,' when I was watching, which was kind of messed up," he said. "I thought it was part of the whole series but it wasn't."

But he said the Red Sox must focus on their own play, not on how good the Yankees and other opponents are. And Garciaparra has tunnel vision when it comes to working on his own performances. "I've got to improve on everything. I'm never satisfied," he said. "I just don't like anything getting in the way, even in the offseason when I'm working out. That's my time. Nothing gets in the way."

So he'll squeeze in his interviews when he can even though, with Vaughn's departure, Garciaparra is "the man" when it comes to Boston's offense.

"Nobody's 'the man.' Baseball's 'the game' and that's all there is to it," Garciaparra said. "It's just a game and I go out there and play it hard and play it to the best of my ability and that's all I can do."

And, at some point, talk about Vaughn's departure will die down. "Mo's over there" in Anaheim, Garciaparra said. "I'm sure he's worried about the team he's on now and trying to help them win the World Series and we're doing the same thing."

After DC (5 career playoff wins) was signed to an obscenely high contract, he was actually looking forward to playing for Charlotte.

That is, until fellow thug Anthony Mason and Rice were lost for the foreseeable future. So Coleman mentally packed it in for his third straight team, and the Hornets' ship is sinking rapidly.

For local fans, don't fret too much over the Celtics 5–5 start. The last two playoff spots in the East will likely be up for grabs, and with Paul Pierce quickly proving to be the real deal, the Green and White remain a logical choice for one of those final berths.

this team." said senior captain Katie Keane of Acton. "Hopefully [the veterans] have helped them turn that spirit into results on the course."

Of the five skiers representing the Minutewomen, only LaBombard competed in last season's Regional.

The men will spend the week preparing for the NCAA Regionals, which are scheduled for this upcoming weekend at Sunday River, Maine. Individuals who qualify there will look toward the NCAA Nationals, set to unfold the weekend of March 10-13 at Black Mountain, Maine. At this point in the season, training for the Minutemen is more about sustaining than improving.

"By now, we know what it's going to take for us to make a strong showing at Nationals," said Holden, who burned up last year's season-culminating tournament to the tune of a sixth place finish in the slalom and 13th in the GS. "It's all about going out and getting the job done."

capturing the event at George Washington and at Yale. Her all-around score has improved more than a full point this year from a 37.450 set in 1996 to a career-best of 38.625, but that is still not stopping the five-foot senior from setting her sights on even loftier goals.

"I want to stay healthy for the rest of the season and I want to be in the lineup," said LoPresti. "Personally I would like to set some more records of my own. I would like to keep bringing it [my all-around score] up. I want to break a 39. That is my goal for this year. Our main focus [as a team] is making it to regionals. And we want big numbers, we'd love big numbers. Our main goal is to stay together and learn how to work together. We do a great job of that but that is what we want to keep doing."

As a senior co-captain, uniting the team and pulling them together is one of her added responsibilities, yet LoPresti is quick to point to the role that all of the seniors collectively play in leading the team.

"All of us are very vocal," said LoPresti. "All seven of us lead the team all together. For me, I am very loud. I make sure everyone hears me. They can hear me no matter if they want to or not. When we are at the meets I try to keep cheering and keep the team focused."

Keeping herself focused is a skill that the senior has perfected. LoPresti has shined this season despite the fact that the Minutewomen's schedule has been characterized by a tough road schedule, and home meets that have taken them up against some of the premiere gymnastics programs in the nation. LoPresti has shown that not even nationally ranked programs like No. 12 Michigan and No. 1 Alabama can shake her focus and consistency.

"I don't really get too nervous so that helps me alot," said LoPresti. "I like to compete. I think it is really fun. So when I get out there I am always laughing. I do it for fun."

Michelle's love of gymnastics and competition stems from her interest in the sport from such an early age. The New York native has been doing gymnastics for most of her life.

"I got into gymnastics when I was five, since I climbed up all the furniture and bounced on the beds," said LoPresti. "I had way too much energy. I stuck with it. I won states in high school for club. I went to nationals and regionals."

A very impressive list of achievements, but LoPresti is not settling for past accomplishments and is looking ahead to honing her skills and becoming the best gymnast that she can be.

"I am working on a new vault. I am trying to improve that. On every event I have been working new stuff, trying to get my tumbling passes down. The team is not just about one person it is about everybody. There are other people stepping up all the time."

For LoPresti the focus is not on one individual. UMass gymnastics is a team sport, and it is as a team that the members will continue to rise and fall. Success has come when Massachusetts has banded together and enjoyed competing as a unit.

"Women's gymnastics is fun," said LoPresti. "It is fun to watch. It's really exciting. A lot of people think it's a very serious sport, but it is really a lot of fun. We love the noise and the attention."

If she continues to have the season that she has been having, even more attention will be focused on senior co- captain Michelle LoPresti.

come down to a Chris Kirkland put-back, had there have been time. Kirkland easily led the Minutemen with 15 points and a career-high 16 rebounds. Cruz entered the game late, providing a defensive spark and, darting around an open left side of LaSalle's defense with 33.9 seconds remaining, cut the deficit to one, 58-57.

In the game's infancy, UMass had control, boasting a 17- 12 lead with roughly eight minutes passed in the opening frame before their opponents capitalized on three unanswered baskets. Regardless, neither team could make their offense look smooth or efficient in the first period; the Minutemen were shooting 24% from the field while recording a two to nine turnover-to-assist ratio, and LaSalle could connect only 33% of the time. Still, as time wound down in the second half, either team could have won.

In the end, though, no Minuteman wanted to be a hero.

No straw will break these Camels' backs; coach disciplines small school

By Donna Tommelleo
Associated Press

NEW LONDON, Conn. — Six years ago, the men's basketball program at Connecticut College was the cellar dweller of the New England Small College Athletic Conference and on the verge of being temporarily shelved.

The program found a turnaround guy in Glen Miller, who knew a thing or two about rebuilding. He played under Jim Calhoun at Northeastern and was part of the original coaching staff when Calhoun took over in 1986 at Connecticut, a program languishing near the bottom of the Big East.

Connecticut (24-2) has since become a national powerhouse and held the No. 1 ranking for 10 weeks this year, before falling to No. 4 this week.

Miller's Cameis are having the best season on record and at 22-0 are No. 1 in Division III with two games left.

Miller said he and Calhoun have a "great relationship" and talk often.

"I like to think I'd still have the same work ethic and drive to be successful if I'd never associated with him," Miller said yesterday. "But certainly he has those qualities. He has a real will and determination to get the most out of practice every day and to improve his team."

So, too, has Miller, according to his players.

"He expects the absolute best. Nothing less," senior co-captain Dwayne Stallings said. "Even if we win, it's not satisfying unless you play well."

The Cameis have played increasing well in each of Miller's six years at the private, liberal arts school.

Miller, 37, has taken the Camels from a 6-18 record in 1993-94 to 22-4 last year. The team advanced to the round of 16 in the NCAA tournament.

The turnaround didn't surprise Calhoun.

"He (Miller) fell in love with coaching," Calhoun said. "He has a no-nonsense work ethic."

There are similarities in their game plans, as well. Both teams thrive on full-court pressure, man-to-man defense and a speedy transition game.

Building a winner meant upgrading the recruiting program. Miller, who grew up in neighboring Groton, inherited a program with just two recruited players. He started prospecting for talent right outside his office at Luce Fieldhouse.

"I used to sit here and look out the window and anybody that walked down the stairs and looked like they had any athletic ability I'd meet them at the front door and asked them if they play basketball or if they were interested," Miller said.

He struck gold in his own backyard. Stallings, a 6-3 guard from New London, is the team scoring leader and 3-point specialist with a 43 percent average from beyond the arc. He's averaging 14.8 points a game and has 147 3-pointers.

The last four years have been a ride to remember, said Stallings, who chose Connecticut College for its academics and has a job with a business firm waiting for him upon graduation. "I'm having a great time. I just wish I could come back for another four years. It's gone by too fast."

Miller has been much of the reason, he said.

"He's fun, he's energetic, he really, really loves to win and he loves the game. So do I," Stallings said. "I think we work out well when it comes to winning and losing."

The Spurs' twin towers not meant to be; deal to NJ

To get the ball rolling, here is the blockbuster deal that should go down, but never will: The New Jersey Nets send Keith Van Horn and Kendall Gill to San Antonio for Tim

Sanford Appell
NBA

Duncan and Steve Kerr. Before you choke on your Worcester breakfast sandwiches consider this: both teams are severely struggling. The Nets are 2-7 as of press time, and the perennially fast-starting Spurs are 5-6.

It is time for Spurs coach/GM Gregg Popovich to swallow some pride and realize he should have drafted the 6-10 forward out of Utah instead of assembling another pair of Twin Towers.

The only way a Duncan/David Robinson combination could have worked was if Popovich retired one of the premier two-guards (i.e Mitch Richmond). But the Spurs are still without a legitimate outside threat other than Kerr, who is a defensive liability, so opponents are able to throw everything including the kitchen sink at Gillespie's tallest spokespeople.

Add Van Horn and Gill into the mix, and Robinson can return to dominance in the paint, while Van Horn infuses his unique brand of inside–outside play to the line–up. The kicker for the Spurs is they will get a much needed backcourt production from Gill, who finally returns to his natural position at the two.

For Spurs fans who still feel they are being cheated, realize that Van Horn is seventh in the league in scoring with 22.5 ppg, while Duncan has posted 19.3. After battling through injuries, Robinson is still more than capable of holding down the fort in the middle, as evidenced by his 17 point, 17 rebound effort against Minnesota on Tuesday.

As far as the Nets are concerned, the deal is a no–brainer. They may think they have the answer to all their problems in Van Horn, but the truth is he will never win a championship without a superstar like Robinson at his side.

While Jayson Williams is a legit All–Star by virtue of his amazing knack for offensive rebounding and leadership, he is out of position at center because he provides major offense only as often as Pat Riley wears a cheap suit.

Why not simply start Rony Seikaly at center to move Williams over? Well, three or four years ago that may have been a solution, but the bottom line is Seikaly is constantly being relocated because he can't stay healthy.

While neither franchise would ever part with the featured players in the deal, both starting line–ups are noticeably better after this deal had hypothetically transpired. Consider a Spurs front line of Robinson, Van Horn, Sean Elliott and then the "new" Nets with Duncan, Williams and a bench that finally includes somebody who can shoot, with Kerr, and the deal makes perfect sense.

On the topic of Rodman, "The Worm" will only further disrupt the ailing chemistry in Tinseltown if he ever decides to show up.

Del Harris's job security is becoming day–to–day with each loss, including the Nuggets' thrilling overtime win on Monday. Therefore, picking up Rodman will not only make Harris's head of grey hair grow thin very quickly, but may finally cost him his job at the helm if he cannot co–exist with the rebounding machine.

Rodman may not be the answer, but a potential Glen Rice swap with Charlotte for Eddie Jones and Elden Campbell seems to add up because the Lakers need to get rid of Campbell's lackadaisal approach and fully establish Kobe Bryant as their two–guard.

The loss of Steve Smith for up to two weeks will prove how vulnerable Atlanta is in regards to the health of their starters.

The Hawks still sport one of the weakest benches in the league, as they were painfully reminded in an embarrassing loss to the new–look Chicago Bulls.

Chris Webber has been performing like an all–world player in leading the way for the NBA's biggest surprise in Sacramento. Webber has been playing like a man possessed for the first time in his career, averaging 22.1 points and a league–leading 14.2 boards per game.

The type of play that Webber and Rookie of the Year front–runner Jason Williams have exhibited may finally boost the Kings back into the post–season.

While Webber has shined on what was expected to be a sub–par squad, Derrick Coleman has melted under the pressure once again.

LoPresti is back

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Michele LoPresti has battled through serious injury to lead the UMass women's gymnastics team in her senior year.

By Matthew Frascella
Collegian Staff

The spring semester of 1997 marked a major setback for Massachusetts gymnast Michelle LoPresti. After competing in every meet on the uneven bars, tragedy struck when the sophomore dislocated her elbow, forcing her into an uphill battle to return to the heights where she had once been.

The injury set her back and it took her all of last year to regain her winning form.

"That was fun," said LoPresti sarcastically recalling her injury and the work it took to get back into the UMass lineup. "It was really scary. It set me back just because I couldn't work out for seven months, but last year I spent the whole time coming back. I have what I had. I would think definitely [that I am back to one hundred percent]."

Now in her senior campaign for the Minutewomen, LoPresti is eclipsing all her previous personal marks. Her success in a new–found role as an all–around competitor is one of the main reasons that UMass gymnastics is currently undefeated in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

"This year I am competing all–around and last year I didn't," said LoPresti. "Last year I was coming off an injury from the previous year, so I was just getting back into shape, and this year I am pretty much healthy. It [this year] has been really fun for me because my whole college career has been one injury after another. Nothing ever seemed to go right but things are looking good right now and I am happy about that."

Her good health this season has ensured her personal bests in four areas of competition. This season LoPresti has surpassed her best scores on the uneven bars (9.850), the balance beam (9.825), the floor exercise (9.800) and the all– around competition (38.625).

LoPresti's new role as all–around competitor has been incredibly fruitful for UMass. At one point in the season, she won the all–around twice in one week.

UMass B-ball drops a loss to Explorers, 63–60

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The seconds were passing by slowly at Gola Arena in Philadelphia. The Massachusetts men's basketball team got the opportunity they were looking for when LaSalle's Donnie Carr, who had pestered them all evening long with three–pointers in crucial situations, finally missed in crunch time. His second free throw rattled out of the rim with the score 63–60 and 6.2 seconds on the clock.

Situations like these can make legends out of mortal athletes. With UMass' seat of third in the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division on the hot–seat with one contest remaining before the conference tournament, a big play was not only necessary, but would have been the material of lore.

The scenario was there. Anyone was welcome to take advantage of it. The Minuteman to take the ball into his own hands and bank in a long–range three with time expiring might have been remembered down the road as the man who made an NIT championship possible, or, dare it be said, saved Coach Bruiser Flint's job.

Reserve guard Rafael Cruz took the ball up–court and the seconds dropped from the scoreboard clock like bricks. Tick... tick... tick...

The ball didn't leave Cruz' hands until it was too late. Monty Mack received the pass on the left wing and fired a long three–point attempt just as the number one was leaving the clock. Without a chance to so much as eye–ball the shot he was taking, the Mack try bounced harmlessly off the side of the rim, and the Explorers (10–14 overall, 7–8 in the conference) joined their ecstatic supporters in hectic jubilation.

In LaSalle's first victory over Massachusetts (12–15, 8–7), they simply made the big plays. UMass did not.

"We didn't make shots, and we didn't make rebounds," Flint said. "We had a couple of balls that fell out of our hands and went out of bounds."

If one decided to blame someone other than the Minutemen themselves for the loss, the finger would have to be pointed at Carr. The Explorers' leading scorer with 18.7 points a contest always seemed to be burying a shot from behind the arc when it hurt UMass most.

With only two points to his credit at the 13:05 mark in the second half, LaSalle's K'Zell Wesson missed a baseline three–pointer. He followed his own shot, grabbed the rebound, and kicked the ball out to Carr. Three for the home team; 45–37.

Carr then drilled another trifecta with 8:38 to go to put the Explorers up by six, 50–44.

Finally, at the 5:16 point, Carr rolled off of a pick to nail a three–point jumper from the top of the key to break a 50–50 tie.

While Donnie Carr always seemed to make dramatic stabs into the UMass effort, Wesson just kept pricking all game long — enough to total 22 points and 10 rebounds.

Massachusetts' best chance for late–game heroics might have had to

Ski teams rip through Regionals

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Through 38 seasons and 18 conference championships, Massachusetts ski coach Bill MacConnell has stressed the importance of skiing as a team.

At this weekend's United States College Ski Association Regionals in Waterville Valley, New Hampshire, the men's team rocketed to a third place finish behind strong individual performances from their top skiers in both the slalom and giant slalom.

Behind eye–popping performances from All–American captain Thomas Holden (sixth in slalom, 15th in GS) and freshman phenomenon Ken Thoman (16th in slalom, 14th in GS), the Minutemen earned a birth at the season–ending tournament, slated for the weekend of March 9–13 at Mammoth Mountain, California. The women's team came up just short of qualifying, coming in fifth place overall.

"In a season of peaks and valleys, we're psyched to be skiing our strongest when it counts the most," said Rich Granger, who described the two practices leading up to the tournament as his "best ever." Granger put together two of his strongest runs of the year in the slalom (22nd) and giant slalom (29th).

Although limited to five qualifiers each, both teams sent a seemingly perfect balance of seasoned downhill vets and fired–up freshmen to vie for the coveted top–four qualifying slots.

The Minutemen also cashed in on the experience of Chris Guertin (24th in GS) and the athleticism of Westfield's Mike Hadden (30th in GS) in their quest for post–season stardom. And while the year–long success of these young superstars has provided an unprecedented lift to the team, their success at Waterville really surprised no one.

"From the instant we got on snow, it was pretty clear what these young guys were going to do," said Holden. "Regionals may require a little different mental approach, but it still comes down to who skis the fastest."

Any discussion of "the fastest" simply has to include Easthampton's own Tina King. The first–year racer has simply punished the giant slalom field this season, winning the GS in the two tournaments that preceded Regionals. That momentum undoubtedly carried over for the Holyoke Catholic graduate, who coupled a staggeringly fast fourth place GS finish with a 33rd in the slalom.

"Tina has been ripping it up all year," said Thoman, himself a GS dominator with six top–15 finishes on the year. "At the end of her runs, people think she must be skiing pretty slow to be so smooth. But she just wins, period."

King wasn't the only woman turning heads for the Maroon and White at Waterville. Sophomore Margaret LaBombard of Queensbury, NY continues to impress, adding an 18th place run in Sunday's slalom to an impressive resume of finishes this season. Rookie Ericka Olson of Pittsfield showed an incredible will to win with top–20 finishes in both the GS (17th) and slalom (19th).

989 Sports returns with a bang, NCAA Final Four '99; Collegian reviewers have mixed thoughts on the result

Keeping up with the changing of the seasons, Paul Teves and Seth Koenig from the Collegian sports editorial staff reviewed their second sports video game of the year: NCAA Final Four '99 by 989 Sports for Playstation.

The two played three games, like they did when they evaluated fall's NCAA Gamebreaker '99, and took notes. Teves emerged victorious in all three games, mastering the three–point shot uncomparably. In game one, he used Fresno State to down Koenig's Utah, 104–85. In game two, Koenig decided to try his hand with our own Massachusetts Minutemen, but lost to Penn State 94–89. Finally, in the third game, Teves' Northeastern clubbed Koenig's Maine by a score of 88–75.

The each editor attempted to use teams from three different talent levels to get a well–rounded feel of the game.

Seth takes it on the chin.

Okay, I'll admit it: Paul kicked the crap out of me. And yes, he did it three straight times.

He just kept hitting three–pointers — he buried at least 20 in both of the first two games — and I couldn't find the rim from behind the arc. The game just didn't like me that much, I guess. That's my story and I'm sticking to it.

My choices for teams to use were simple. I played with UMass because it's our proud school, and I played with Maine because that's my home state. Had I played high school basketball, I would've stood a chance of guarding the Black Bears' Andy Bedard, who finished with 18 points and two blocks in my loss to Paul's Northeastern Huskies. Charlton Clarke was the tragic hero in my defeat at the hands of Penn State, scoring a hefty 37 points.

Chris Herren, Paul's hometown buddy, was the video game MVP, though, pouring in, as I'm sure he's said in his review, 82 points (all from downtown).

Regardless, 989 Sports has only a partial victory with this one. Controlling the players is easy, as it has been in my previous experiences with this company. While it is realistic in that it is possible to whip a pass out of bounds, it is not common enough to frustrate the gaming aficionado. Despite the fact that it was impossible for me to connect for a three– pointer, Paul proved quite clearly that you could fire from long–distance and have success.

One critique in this situation is the somewhat unbelievable frequency with which certain players hit their shots. It seems as though when 989 put players like Herren into computer form, they took for granted that these players were infallible. That's somewhat unrealistic.

The graphics were decent; I found them more impressive during the instant replays than in the actual game play, but I'm not complaining. Another drawback is that you cannot create players, a neat little feature that many sports games have.

The favorite boast of 989's — that they have the first hoops game with real play–by–play commentary— is true, but not well thought out. Their choice for a broadcaster, Quinn Buckner, is irritating and overwhelming.

COURTESY 989 SPORTS

Paul makes the best of the situation.

NCAA Final Four '99, though not a bad game, is not the best one 989 Sports has ever produced.

This college hoops game has all the essentials that a college basketball game should. Along with exact schedules for each team, it also contains every conference in the nation. You can select from any of the roughly 300 Division I teams and play a season. That's a plus.

The game is also based on all the players in Division I. Including the best player in Division I, Chris Herren of Fresno St., which I used in the first game to beat Koenig's head in.

In terms of controlling the players for the PlayStation, it's really easy to handle the players by using the D pad and the R1 and L1. for speed bursts.

The defense is somewhat unrealistic allowing amazing dunks and insane three–pointers occasionally. The other problem that I noticed with the game is that when you go up hard to the basket on offense, either you get fouled or you hit the shot, but never do you get the hoop and the harm. You cannot hit a three–point play inside. Major problem. That's a big part of the game that goes unnoticed.

Another problem in the season options is that there is no conference tournament.

After playing Koenig in these three games, I started a season in the game with Fresno St. Well, I went 31–0 on the freshman level en route to winning the national championship. I was winning by a margin of victory of 65 points with 50 steals per game, and I scored 129 points in 10–minute halves. But at the sophomore level, I play with UMass–Amherst and am currently 2–8. Although you can attribute that to fact that UMass is not as good as the Bulldogs, they're not that bad.

The disparity between the levels of play are terrible and is my biggest pet peeve with this game.

As far as the three games that I played with Koenig, I'm just better then he is. Other than Fresno St., I used all bad teams, like Penn St. and Northeastern, and I still beat him. I would just like to say that my man Herren, from Fall River, lit up Utah for 82 points, 60 from three point shots.

Grad students threaten protests at pro–affirmative action rally

By Stacey Shackford and Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

ROBERTO DELGADO / COLLEGIAN

Lulu Davis, chair of the ALANA caucus, speaks at yesterday's pro–affirmative action rally.

As a student a capella group finished singing "Out of Africa" in the lobby of the Student Union, members of the Graduate Employee Organization and the Graduate Student Senate rallied students outside, arguing that a recent administration decision to alter admissions policies will keep hundreds of minority students out of the University of Massachusetts.

Approximately 100 students gathered on the Student Union steps shortly after noon yesterday as members of GEO and GSS expressed their dismay at Chancellor David K. Scott's Friday decision to shift from an affirmative action admissions policy to one focusing instead on the broader needs of low–income students.

Some students accused the Chancellor of bending to pressure from outside sources when making last Friday's decision.

"Shame on you Chancellor Scott!" said graduate nursing student Carol McShane. "[What you have done] is irresponsible and unacceptable. If you are truly 'committed to a diverse campus,' you need to stand up to those pulling your strings and immediately reverse your politically– motivated decision."

Others expressed dismay at Scott's action, and urged him to reconsider his decision.

"Education is the key for us ALANA [Asian, Latin, African, and Native American] students that can open doors to our futures," said Nana Mendoza, president of the Graduate Student Senate. "I'm asking — no, I'm not asking, I'm demanding — [Chancellor Scott] to reconsider his position around this issue."

"I regret we had to change but they [race–based admissions] were not working," Scott said in a telephone interview yesterday in response to the upset.

Scott said he feels a "much more systematic approach" is necessary to achieve diversity at the University level.

A press release distributed on the campus–wide E–mail system last Friday stated that Scott made his decision in light of changing legal views about affirmative action across the country. Requests for UMass admissions statistics from the Washington D.C. conservative Center for Equal Opportunity, were made in July, according to Kay Scanlan, director of the UMass News Office.

Scanlan said this same center was instrumental in getting affirmative action eliminated in the California state school system two years ago after requesting admissions statistics.

Scott's new admissions policy strategy focuses on factors besides race, such as economic status and first generation to attend college.

But GSS member Mahmood Ketabchi questioned the concern Scott has expressed about low–income students, citing Scott's January revocation of housing vouchers intended to help low–income students.

And many students said they felt the Chancellor was reneging former promises made to diversify the campus.

"I don't think it's an accident that Scott... gave our people a pink slip on Black History Month," said Kiya Stokes, a member of the GSS.

Lulu Davis, chair of the ALANA caucus, argued that the University already has an unacceptably low number of ALANA students, especially in the graduate program. She cited statistics indicating that ALANA students comprise less than 10 percent of the total graduate enrollment of 5,700, and noted that 20 departments have no ALANA students.

"Rather than address these problems, [Scott] decided without consulting students to remove affirmative action," she said.

Chancellor Scott admits that he expects the numbers of ALANA students to drop in the fall semester, but he hopes that the numbers will eventually increase with the new policies in place. And Scanlan denies claims that the University has "reneged on its commitment to diversity."

"This is wildly untrue. We have not retreated. We're just not race sensitive."

The rally lasted less than an hour, but Ketabchi and Stokes assured the crowd they would continue "to fight."

"[Chancellor Scott] has made a big mistake... messing around with us," said Ketabchi. "We're not going to let him."

"We need to build an opposition movement so strong they will be begging to reinstate affirmative action. If we don't get it we will shut this place down!" Stokes cried, and the crowd responded with cheers.

SGA nominations begin; elections head sworn in

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Today marks the start of Student Government Association (SGA) elections. There was a delay in the process because there was no chancellor of elections. However, Jeremy Rouille was sworn in at last night's SGA meeting as the chancellor of elections, and election nominations start today.

Anyone interested in running for student government positions can go to the SGA office and pick up nomination forms. Two hundred and fifty signatures are needed to run for the President and Trustee positions, 100 are needed to run for Area Governor positions.

According to Rouille, the nomination process will last two weeks and then only four days will be devoted to campaigning. The explanation for this "quick election" is that the SGA election process could not begin without a chancellor of elections and until Rouille stepped in, there was no one available to take the position.

"I hope people get involved; these are all important positions and they need to be filled," said Rouille.

SGA President Shamapande would not confirm whether or not he will run for president again, and no other students have come forward to announce they are going to run for the position.

Inquisies concerning Salwa Shamapande's status as a student and as president of the SGA were brought up again last night. Speaker of the House Lisa Cook reassured senators that Shamapande is still the acting president of SGA, and that his matters with the University administration should be settled by Feb. 28. Cook also said that if Shamapande is administratively withdrawn from the University of Massachusetts, he has agreed to resign as president of SGA.

The UMass Dance Theatre came to the SGA last night requesting $2,000 from the SGA finance reserves; they left with $3,000 and tears of joy. According to Senator Brandon Beane from the commuter area, there was no reason not to give the women's team more money because "the finance reserve has $27,000 to give out to Registered Student Organization and no one is asking for it. Only $5,000 has been given out [since the Fall of 98]."

The dance team requested the money for hefty competition fees, according to member Kellie Shea. Ryann Delsignore, another member of the team, said the team does all kinds of fundraisers including Avon sales. The team also goes as far as to clean up and collect beer cans after fraternity parties, she said.

With that statement, senator Timothy Fallon from Southwest–at–large made a motion to give the girls more money. The motion was passed.

Title VII, a part of the SGA constitution that compiles rules and regulations concerning Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), failed last night after much debate. The documents was mandated to be completed by July, 1995. It failed last night due mainly to problems in the wording of the revised document.

Southwest Governor Mike Rossettie argued against passing Title VII because he was worried about future interpretations of the document. One of the phrases that Rossettie had a problem with was, "Slight differences in mission or goals is not enough to warrant registration."

Rossettie reminded senators that earlier in the meeting it was announced that a new RSO was formed, which happened to be a comedy club, and under Title VII that would not be allowed since there are already numerous comedy clubs recognized as RSOs.

SGA Attorney General Jesse Burchfield tried to argue against Rossettie's accusations, but failed, as did the motion.

Du Bois' birthday observed

By Will Thomson
Collegian Correspondent

To celebrate the 131st birthday of W.E.B. Du Bois, University of Massachusetts professor Ernest Allen, Jr. gave a speech yesterday re–evaluating Du Bois' concept of double consciousness.

About 50 students assembled in the archives room of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library to hear the talk entitled, "Du Boisian Double Consciousness: the Unsustainable Argument."

Allen, professor in the W.E.B. Du Bois Department of Afro–American Studies delivered his speech from a podium flanked by an oil painting and a bronze bust of Du Bois. After the talk, students and faculty cut into a birthday cake with Du Bois's portrait drawn in icing.

Allen argued that the popular understanding of Du Bois' theory of racial double consciousness, a term commonly used to discuss the clash of identities of being both black and American, is a misreading. He said that "black–ademics" have read their own meanings into DuBois's The Soul of Black Folk.

Allen said that when DuBois talked about double consciousness, he was referring only to the "talented tenth" of elite blacks. He said that Du Bois was using the concept for "tactical political reasons." Du Bois first advanced the theory in 1897 and after 1903 he abandoned it, Allen explained.

When Du Bois wrote about double consciousness, the situation of segregation was particularly bad for blacks in America. Allen said that it was a time when "black self respect was seriously put to the test."

Allen believes that Du Bois hoped whites "might empathize with the black intelligentsia." He said the concept was put forward "basically to gain recognition from whites and avoid their scorn."

But Du Bois did not mean that blacks felt the pull of two separate identities, he said.

"It is today's academics imposing their own meanings onto the DuBoisian view of the world." Allen said. "DuBois is so abstruse and enigmatic and beautiful that these phrases just catch you."

Allen said many people read Du Bois in the '60s and identified with the concept.

"In the sixties, I thought that it expressed how I felt at the time. But as I studied it, looking for a unifying theoretical thread, I began to question what it was Du Bois was really saying in there."

Starting in the sixties, more opportunities began to open up for blacks in the corporate world, Allen said. "The cultural clash began as blacks began to move in larger circles in the society."

In the 1960's, educated blacks started "claiming black mass culture." Instead of looking for recognition from whites, "respectability came from inside the race

Doctor prejudice may be a factor in cardiac care discrepancies

By Linda A. Johnson
Associated Press

Unconscious prejudices among doctors may help explain why women and blacks complaining of chest pain are less likely than men and whites to receive the best cardiac testing, a study suggests.

Researchers have found such differences in care previously, and have attributed them to financial barriers and differences in patients' preferences, medical condition and access to care. However, a new study of 720 physicians found that, with all symptoms being equal, doctors were only 60 percent as likely to order cardiac catheterization for women and blacks as for men and whites.

For black women, the doctors were only 40 percent as likely to order catheterization.

Catheterization is considered the "gold standard" diagnostic test for heart disease. It involves squirting dye into cardiac arteries, then X–raying them to find blockages and determine the best treatment.

"Most likely this is an underestimate of what's occurring," Dr. Kevin Schulman of Georgetown University Medical Center said, because the doctors knew their decisions were being recorded — although not why.

In the unusual study, doctors attending medical conferences were told they were participating in a study of clinical decision making, and viewed medical data and a taped interview with one of eight "patients." The patients were really actors.

There were two black women, two black men, two white women and two white men, divided into two identical groups. In one group, all the patients were said to be 5% in the other group, 70.

The actors described identical symptoms. Information such as insurance coverage, profession and results of a heart stress test also were the same.

Still, researchers found disparities in doctors' treatment recommendations.

"We still need to understand a lot more about why these differences occur," Schulman said. "This may all be subconscious."

The research was reported in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine.

Another journal report suggests black patients with congestive heart failure have a higher risk of death or worsening disease than whites getting similar treatment.

In congestive heart failure, the heart's ability to pump blood gradually declines, causing pain, shortness of breath and other symptoms.

Israeli Consul General visits UMass; discusses peace process, May election

By Elana Premack and Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

The Syrians are preventing Israel and Lebanon from making peace, according to Consul General of Israel to New England Itzhak Levanon.

Levanon spoke to members of the University community yesterday afternoon as part of this year's "Israel at 50" lecture series run by the University of Massachusetts Hillel House.

Levanon argued that Israel is seeking to make peace with Lebanon, but it must first make sure that its own citizens and territories are safe.

"Our standing is [that] we don't have territorial aspirations with Lebanon," said Levanon.

Levanon remarked that in the present situation, the Hizballa terrorist organization will continue to attack Israel regardless of any Israeli decision to withdraw its troops.

"We cannot afford to pull back unilaterally, because the Hizballa will attack deeper Israel," Levanon said.

He is supportive of change, but change which is "not at the expense of our own security, not at the expense of our own survival."

In Levanon's lecture, "Painting the Political Landscape: Ramifications of the Peace Process," he addressed recent events in the Middle East and the changes inherent in Israel's May elections.

Levanon stressed that Israel's relations with Lebanon and its other neighbors will stand as critical and deciding issues in Israel's election results.

"The Israeli voter has a big dilemma," Levanon said. "He will be participating in building up the future relationship of Israel and its neighbors."

The elections will determine both Israel's prime minister and Knesset representatives.

"There has been a keen wish from the Israeli public to see substantial change in terms of the peace process," said Levanon.

"There is a particular significance for the outcome of these elections," he added. "Those elected will be those that will have to deal with the Middle East in the year 2000."

Levanon cited misrepresentation of the religious parties and deep fragmentation as some of the difficulties in the elections.

"We have 37 parties and more than six candidates for prime minister," Levanon said. "The religious parties have much more influence than their own size."

The divide between religious and secular Jews came to a head recently when roughly 300,000 people demonstrated in Jerusalem for a religious platform.

"We are in the midst of a social and national discussion on the differences between secular and religious," Levanon said.

He said that the discussion involves defining who is a Jew.

"Is a non–religious Israeli Jew considered a Jew or not?" Levanon said. "'Jewish' is not only religion. 'Jewish' is tradition. 'Jewish' is values. 'Jewish' is beliefs."

Though religious divides will play a part in the upcoming elections, it is the future of the Middle East that will be the outcome.

Levanon questioned the continuity of the peace process by future Arab leaders.

"Who is going to carry the torch of the peace process?" Levanon said. "Will the new leaders of the Arab world continue their predecessors' relationships with Israel?"

Levanon said that Israel had "excellent" relations with Jordan and the late King Hussein, and that he believes strong relations between Israel and Jorda.i will be maintained by the new King Abdallah.

"The new king is well known to the Israelis," Levanon said. "He has all the qualifications and the skills."

Hussein's recognition of "Israel as a reality" played a role in peace between Israel and Jordan. This peaceful coexistence will hopefully be the "radical change" for which Levanon said the Middle East is "ripe."

"I believe that the peace process will continue," Levanon said. "But it will take the inherent interest of both sides to change the situation."

itself." Allen said: only then did there emerge "a sense of black autonomous culture."

Blacks are not the only ones who deal with conflicting identities. Allen said that women and members of other groups also felt the clash of different allegiances.

But Allen also pointed out that double consciousness is not necessarily destructive — it gives a person the ability to view the world from multiple perspectives.

"This yields more than looking at the world through one stationary lens," he said.

According to Allen, the United States also suffers an identity conflict between the ideals that say all are created equal, and the reality of inequality in the United States.

"There was a double consciousness among whites as well. They loved the sound of the words of the Constitution but balked when it came to putting them into action," he said.

The talk was the last of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library events celebrating Black History Month. The events were co-sponsored by the Black Student Union, the W.E.B. Du Bois Department of Afro-American Studies, the Student Affairs Office, and the UMass Library System.

Clinton collects $2.3 million for defense

By Jonathan D. Salant
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — While Bill Clinton was being impeached, supporters contributed $2.3 million to help him pay his legal bills.

That's how much Clinton's legal defense fund took in between mid-August, after Clinton's first public admission of an improper relationship with Monica Lewinsky, and mid-February, when the Senate acquitted the president of perjury and obstruction of justice.

More money is expected. The fund recently sent out letters that noted: "The effort to impeach President Clinton is only the latest in a series of legal actions that have left the First Family with a staggering personal debt... If you are disturbed by the way politics is conducted today, then what better response than to offer the first family your own gesture of support?"

Overall, the fund raised $4.5 million during its first year, from 50,000 contributions, trustees reported yesterday. The money helped whittle the Clintons' outstanding legal bills from $9 million to $5.2 million.

One $10,000 donor, Atlanta businessman J.B. Fuqua, said wealthy individuals who prospered under the Clinton administration have an obligation to help the president financially.

"We all knew when he ran for president the first time that he played around with women," Fuqua said. "I don't approve of it, but nevertheless that's a fact of life."

Clinton received 56 contributions of $5,000 or more during the last six months, including $10,000 apiece from Lew Wasserman, former chairman of Universal Studios; singer Tony Bennett; and Don Henley, a member of the Eagles musical group. Archer Daniels Midland executive Dwayne Andreas gave $5,000, as did author Stephen King and actor Robert DeNiro.

Still, the average contribution was $90, trustees said, and 95 percent of the donors gave $100 or less.

"We have seen an overwhelmingly positive response to our efforts to reduce this enormous financial burden, from average Americans and larger donors alike," the fund's executive director, Anthony Essaye, said.

In the last six months, the fund has sent out hundreds of thousands of letters to prospective donors, cultivating its mailing list from a variety of sources including Democratic Party contributors.

In addition, Essaye said, the fund will ask earlier contributors to give again.

As part of National Eating Disorder Awareness Week (Feb. 22–26), Mount Holyoke College will present a lecture by Dr. Catherine Steiner–Adair on "The Body Politic: Women, Eating Disorders and Culture."

The discussion will be held tonight at 7 p.m. at Mount Holyoke's Willits Hallowell Conference Center.

In her presentation, Dr. Steiner–Adair will discuss the connection between women's often negative feelings about their bodies and the body politic — those who benefit from women hating their bodies. She will focus on the political and sociocultural understanding of why eating disorders have occurred in our culture.

Additionally, Steiner–Adair will reformulate eating disorders as a social justice issue connected to issues of diversity.

A clinical and consulting psychologist, Steiner–Adair works as the director of Education, Prevention and Outreach at a new non–profit organization called Harvard Eating Disorders Center.

She did her doctoral work at Harvard University with Carol Gilligan and has been featured in the PBS documentary, Inside Hunger, and in the film The Famine Within.

The event is free and open to the public, and is sponsored by Five College Inc. and Mount Holyoke's Purington Lecture Fund, Health Education program, and HOPE, a student group.

Doctors at odds over dragging–death killer

By Michael Graczyk
Associated Press

JASPER, Texas — A white man convicted of dragging a black man to death will probably cling to his racist beliefs and could lash out violently again, a psychiatrist yesterday told the jury that will decide whether the defendant should live or die.

Other prosecution witnesses said John William King, the white supremacist convicted Tuesday in the slaying of James Byrd Jr. last June, acted up in jail by threatening to assault a police investigator and smashing a TV set.

A defense expert, however, said a life sentence would be appropriate for the 24-year-old former laborer.

Dr. Walter Quijano, a former chief psychologist for the Texas prison system now in private practice, said he based the conclusion on King's lack of drug use and the fact he used no weapons during previous crimes.

In Texas, a person serving a life sentence cannot become eligible for parole for at least 40 years.

"The probability of people at age 64 committing violence is very low," Quijano said.

A bailiff said King fell asleep during Quijano's testimony. King was sitting at the defense table, his head in his hand, when he apparently drifted off for a few minutes.

Dr. Edward Gripon, a forensic psychiatrist who testified for the prosecution after reviewing King's writings and photographs of his racist tattoos, said he doubts King will shake his beliefs.

"Anyone who has white supremacist or any other kind of racist feelings, if they are heavily invested in that kind of ideology, it's not going to just go away," Gripon said.

The psychiatrist also said: "I feel he would pose a continued threat for future acts of violence."

The jury probably will be given the case today.

Byrd, 49, died June 7 when he was pulled nearly three miles behind a pickup truck, chained by his ankles.

Two other men, Shawn Berry, 24, and Lawrence Brewer, 31, are awaiting trial in the slaying.

Builder charged in Omagh blast

By Shawn Pogatchnik
Associated Press

DUBLIN, Ireland — Irish authorities charged their first suspect yesterday in the car bombing of Omagh, more than six months after IRA dissidents slaughtered 29 people in the Northern Ireland town.

Colm Murphy, a building contractor and pub owner, appeared in Dublin's Special Criminal Court — where cases are heard before three judges and no jury — three days after police arrested him at his farmhouse near Dundalk, 50 miles north of Dublin.

The senior judge, Justice Frederick Morris, said the 48-year-old Murphy is charged with being a member of the breakaway Irish Republican Army faction that carried out the Aug. 15 attack and of "conspiring to carry out explosions" around that date. The second charge carries a potential life sentence.

Murphy was charged in the Irish Republic because the crime — conspiring to cause explosions — was committed in the republic. The IRA is outlawed in both parts of Ireland.

The 500-pound bomb in Omagh tore through a crowd who had been herded unwittingly by police nearer to the bomb because of a misleading telephone warning.

The 29 dead and 370 injured represented the bloodiest single event in the 30-year history of conflict over Northern Ireland. Murphy, accompanied by armed police guards, spoke only once during the 10-minute hearing, to confirm his identity.

Which schmoe for President?

With President Bill Clinton's impeachment trial over in the Senate, the country and the Congress as well as the President can get back to dealing with the nation's business. But who are we kidding — that isn't why everyone is excited. The thing that has everybody fired up is that we can finally start worrying about which of these schmoes will be running for office in 2000.

Let's start with the latest news on the GOP side in the nomination for President.

Governor George Bush Jr. (R-Texas) right now is the man for the Republicans. Being a moderate, he has earned the support of two-thirds of the Republican governors who met this weekend at the National Governors Association winter meetings in Washington D.C.

Paul Teves

The Republicans, who own 30 of the nation's 50 governorships, can use that power in throwing much of their existing weight to Governor Bush. Although he hasn't announced his candidacy, he is currently the front-runner for the nomination.

"I'm interested right now in fulfilling my obligation to the people of Texas," Bush said in a interview at the Governor meetings.

Governor John Engler (R-Mich.) spent most of the weekend drumming up support for the Bush candidacy. Governor Frank Keating (R-Okla.) said that Bush is good at building coalitions, especially among minority groups, and he has also done a great job improving education.

This is the only way for Republicans to go if they have any intentions of competing for the presidency. After the spectacle of the impeachment hearings and trial, the Republicans need a moderate candidate win the nomination in order to have a shot at the presidency.

Other governors like Tommy Thompson (R-Wisc.) and Christine Todd Whitman of New Jersey are holding off on throwing their support into Bush's campaign, in order to see which other candidates emerge. But Bush can count on little leb Bush from Florida to throw his support to his nomination. The thought of a bunch of Bushes in the White House really bothers me, but then again we already have that, just ask Linda Tripp.

Elizabeth Dole traveled to Iowa when she visited Iowa State University for a political conference on Tuesday. Dole is high on most GOP presidential nomination lists. But she, too, has not officially thrown her hat into the race. Recent polls show that Dole is neck-and-neck with Bush in New Hampshire, which is one of the all-important first primaries.

The number of women who were at the conference at ISU was impressive, proving that the Democrats might have to worry about a candidate like Dole stealing the female vote.

In other Republican news, former California Governor Pete Wilson decided recently not to run. He said it wouldn't be practical to run for the nomination in 2000. Wilson also said that he would be unable to raise the $20-25 million needed to win the nomination.

And finally, Pat Buchanan has taken a leave of absence from CNN's "Crossfire" to explore running for the presidency yet again. Buchanan ran in 1992 and 1996, and neither time has he been able to win the nomination.

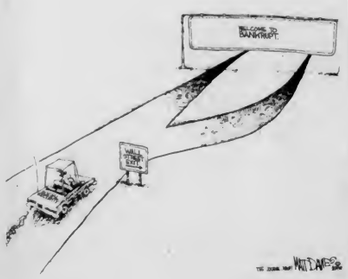
Buchanan represents the wacko end of the Republican Party. Republicans need a moderate to win the presidency, and for that reason he should feel free to drop out today, save himself some money, and save us the trouble of listening to his highly conservative ideals.

Currently the polls show that both Bush and Dole are real tight in New Hampshire, with Buchanan thoroughly out of the picture.

In one random note, the GOP is planning to hold a party fundraiser at The Watergate Hotel in Washington. That is somewhat ironic, but I thank the organizers of the Republican Party for giving me a reason to talk about Watergate.

On the Democratic side of the nomination for president, one name right now sticks out and it's Vice President Al Gore, who seemingly has labor support. Labor is a Democratic stronghold, and Gore looks to utilize it now that House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt is out of the race. AFL-CIO leaders say that they're really impressed with the stands Gore has taken on strikes and organizing drives. Gore is also asking for Gephardt supporters in New Hampshire and Iowa to throw their clout his way.

The other name in the race for the Democrats is former senator Bill Bradley from New Jersey, who is also seeking support from Labor, but he voted for NAFTA (North American Free Trade Agreement) while a senator, and he will need to answer to criticisms of this.



Gore's approval rating is currently as high as Clinton's New Hampshire polls.

One of the other major races getting a lot of ink is the Senate race which right now has the possibility of including Hillary Rodham Clinton (First Lady), Alphonse D'Amato (former Republican senator from New York) and New York City Mayor Rudy Giulliani. They will likely battle over the seat that will be left vacant by Daniel Patrick Moynihan's retirement. Fifty-six percent of the voters polled said Clinton should run.

Clinton currently leads in a poll about the hypothetical race by nine points over Giulliani. Giulliani isn't discouraged by the poll.

D'Amato currently encourages the Republicans not to use the Clinton scandal as a election ploy. Knowing D'Amato, that has to be the smartest thing he has ever said. The Republicans better take heed, because three Democratic senators will be retiring, which gives the GOP a lot to be hopeful for in 2000.

Monkey business

Is the fight for animal rights being overdone? If you read the Boston Globe on Tuesday, Feb. 16, you might think so. Then again, you might think that primates are finally getting the justice they deserve. Like many, you might be under a "double-edged sword." Primates should have all the rights of humans, not being "needled," but then you realize that without testing done on them, many medical cures would not have been found. I am under the "double-edged sword." Any kind of animal testing is wrong to me, but then I look at the breakthrough work that my father does, which involves animal testing.

This whole thing is being considered in a bill in New Zealand, where 36 apes are currently faced with testing that is not prohibited by the new law. This new law includes the rights not to be killed, not to be tortured, and not to have any research done on them that doesn't benefit the subject being researched. The bill is expected to come up for a vote within the next month. If this bill is passed, then it will be the first step toward acknowledging human kinship with our closest relative, and the first step in animal rights. In order for this law to be accepted all around, it must also take into account the "double-edged sword."

Emily Vacanti

As I read the article, I realized the lack of rights inherent in the conditions that these primates live in. Chimps are similar to humans, so they should be given adequate living spaces. Their cages are around 175 cubic feet. That basically gives them room to sit and move around a bit. But then again, they're treated better than most human children in the safety aspect: "a strictly limited range of temperatures, must not have any sharp, dangerous objects in their cages, and must have toys to play with." If you were to walk into any new mother's house, you'd find a range of sharp objects which seem harmless, but aren't in reality.

I don't think of this as a joke, but it made the front page, which the Clinton scandal didn't. The people who are taking this most seriously are, as expected, the animal rights activists. Their biggest threat is the "Great Ape Project." This project prohibits "any scientific or medical research that is not in the best interest of the animals themselves."

The only things that these activists are taking into consideration are the negative aspects of the treatment of primates. They're totally ignoring the fact that primates get better care than many children. True, primates should not be tested upon for medical research that is not imperative at that specific point in time. But if a problem does become imperative, and primates are needed for testing which would benefit human lives, then what are we waiting for? You might have to sacrifice a sheep to save a herd, but then you will have saved the whole herd.

There will always be positives and negatives about every issue. With this it's basic: rights for primates, or medical research that could save the lives of millions. I didn't say that it is a simple equation, but at least the sides are rather clear. Buy your products from The Body Shop (overpriced, but its products have not been tested on animals) if you don't want to promote animal testing in any way, shape or form. But also don't attack something that could change the world due to its medical advantages. It's your choice.

Six degrees of...

I'm sure that you've heard the phrase, "It's the little things that make life interesting." You may have heard it a little differently than that, but I'm sure the gist was the same. Well, maybe the little things make life interesting and maybe it's the big things, but I don't care. It's not important to this column. I just want to talk about one of the little things in life that I really like. It is when you see, hear, touch or smell something and then you immediately think of something else. Socrates called this recollection. It's like when you walk into a department store and smell a perfume that makes you think about a girl you used to know. It's kind of weird and magical how the mind works.

Anyway, I was talking about this mysterious capability of the mind the other day with my friends. We were all giving examples from our lives. My friend Evan said that the smell of leather reminds him of baseball because of his favorite glove that he always kept in perfect condition. Then my friend John said that leather reminds him of his parents. We all decided that it was best to not ask why.

Next I said that whenever I see Marilyn Manson I can't help but think of pumpkin pie. When I said this everyone looked at me like I had two heads. I thought that this correlation between Manson and pumpkin pie was something that everyone in life realized, but apparently I was wrong. So I explained the following to them.

Dan Viens

You see, when I think about Marilyn Manson I automatically think of dentistry. This is because in one of his videos he had all of these primitive dental contraptions in his mouth.

The dental profession consequentially makes me think of The Grateful Dead. The reason for this is that a dentist's office and a Dead concert are two places where you can purchase nitrous oxide for a price.

Then you must understand that the Grateful Dead makes me think of Monster Trucks. This is because they both need big aromas to put on their shows.

In turn, Monster Trucks make me think of white trash. If you've ever seen a Monster Truck exhibition commercial you know why.

White trash makes me think of corn on the cob. The reason for this is that most white trash can't eat corn on the cob because they don't have enough teeth.

Obviously corn on the cob makes me think of nuclear war. This is because nuclear missiles are the same sort of shape as corn on the cob.

When I think of nuclear war I immediately think of the theme song to Final Jeopardy. This is because the song and nuclear war both signify the end of things.

"Jeopardy," believe it or not, makes me think of those books for girls called Sweet Valley High. The reason for this is that I can remember my stepsister Emily reading one of those books and it was called Double Jeopardy.

Sweet Valley High makes me think of Cypress Hill. The reason for this is that one of their songs goes, "I want to get high, so high."

Cypress Hill makes me think of neurologists. This is because of Cypress Hill's other song that goes, "Insane in the membrane, Insane in the brain."

Of course, neurologists make me think of cheddar cheese. This is because neurologists use sharp tools for their surgery and sometimes cheddar cheese can be sharp.

Most people would think of Wisconsin when they see cheese, but I think of Seattle. This is because a girlfriend of mine once visited Seattle and brought me back a cheese wheel. As a result of this our relationship was brought to an abrupt halt.

Seattle automatically brings Boston to mind. The reason for this is that Frasier Crane lives in Seattle on Frasier and he lived in Boston on Cheers.

When I think of Boston I tend to think about the rich history involved with that city. There isn't a much more prominent city than Boston when it comes to American history.

One of the quintessential moments in American history is of course when the Pilgrims arrived in 1620. After all, the Pilgrims are almost as important to our history as the invention of low-calorie edible underpants.

And, drumroll please, when I think of Thanksgiving I automatically think of my favorite pie. This, of course, is pumpkin pie.

Well, I hope this whole thing came together for you. To me it was all pretty obvious that Marilyn Manson and pumpkin pie go hand in hand. Oh my God! Wait a minute. I just realized that I made a huge mistake. It isn't Marilyn Manson who reminds me of pumpkin pie, it's my grandparents' neighbor Madeline Manson. Man, she makes the best pumpkin pie every year.

I didn't mean to drag all of you through this, but if you get a chance, try Mrs. Manson's pie.

Suburban "coolness"

"Big pants. Wear those, and a sports bra. It gets hot in there." That was the fashion lowdown from Mike, a friend who was about to introduce me to the rave scene on Friday. Back in high school, raves were cool, but I had no idea where to find one. All scenes have a shelf-life, but I wasn't sure if raves were out or still in.

The trip to Portland, Maine was around three hours. We pulled into the parking lot and saw the sign: "Metropolitan — Bringing Serious Nightlife to Portland." It was an old factory, not the archetypal field with huge mobile lighting (the night was below freezing). The bouncer didn't check IDs, a bad omen. Inside, the "bar" sold Poland Spring water at $5 for a small bottle, $6 for a large. In addition, it sold glowsticks of all sizes.

Disheartened, I checked out the action. Half the teens on the floor had mini-glowsticks in their mouths. "The poor man's tongue ring" was held in the mouth and rolled around, emitting a dull pink glow from the cheeks. Meanwhile, the stickers on the kids' pimply faces sparkled. Mike was right — sports bras and big pants were all over the place, along with butterfly hair clips and pacifiers.

Tanya Mannes

It got more and more annoying. Lots of the teens had whistles around their necks. On one side of the room, a whistle would shriek out in a pattern. Then, everyone would imitate it. There were loud whistles, the most spine-tingling sound this side of Dave Matthews.

A 15-year-old chain-smoking raver gave me a lollipop. Another one introduced me to the pleasure of Vicks Vaporub inhalers. "Spray it on your eyes, girl. Feels nice, eh?" Around me, juiced-up kids were smearing Vaporub all over their bodies. As expected, drugs were everywhere. Everyone was offering me "E" (ecstasy) and "K" (horse tranquilizers).

As the night moved on, I camped out on one of the filthy, damp couches, next to pubescent ravers who were alternately pawing each other and staring off into space. Suddenly a stream of water hit me in the eye. It was Mike, with a water pistol. At this point, E'd out, he thought of this as the equivalent of a witty joke. I told him I was going to sleep in the car.

"Tanya, I'm so sorry! If there was anything I could do..."

"Hey, you're the one with the car keys."

I awakened at 7 a.m. as Mike got in the car, sweating, pale and apologetic. "No harm done," I told him. "Forget it."

The next day's (Feb. 21st) Boston Globe reinforced my reaction. Under the headline "Change of uniform" was the teaser, "Baggy pants move to suburbs, so city kids move on." The article explored why suburban youths reach out to so-called "street culture" — because they "crave the freedom and self-expression of street life."

The article shows how suburbanites don't have their own culture because they're isolated, unlike the inner-city groups. Faith Popcorn, a trend forecaster for BrainReserve in New York City, says "[Dressing in urban fashions] allows suburban teens to transport themselves to a place that may feel more authentic to them without leaving the comforts of home."

The suburban raver kids I saw were paying money for rave accessories, acting like orally-fixated infants, and spraying Vicks into their eyes. It was a diluted, lame version of the original rave culture. Once ripe, but I had missed it. This was rotten.

THE TACKY STUFF WE HATE TO LOVE

Sex and candy

So you're a bomb in bed. You ruined her Valentine's Day. Your foreplay was somewhat slobbery. You knocked over the incense and lit the down pillow on fire, she ran around the room naked, screaming and sneezing from the feathers. You offered her a slightly scorched sheet to wipe her nose in and she ended up looking like a Catholic who fell into the ash pot last Wednesday. You laughed, and she beat you up with the bouquet of roses

Is any of this familiar?

Alexandra Sakkar

The only true path to a woman's heart is through candy, preferably chocolate. Women eat chocolate when they want to have sex with you and you're not around, and sometimes women prefer chocolate to sex. The only way to atone for your Valentine's Day debacle is to feed her chocolate since she won't let you touch her, even for a quick hug.

Let me offer you some advice on the best and the brightest of the candy world. First you need to

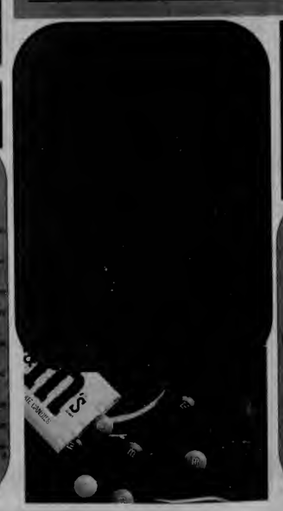
Tongue in cheek rock

There are a dwindling number of people in this world who are not self-conscious about the music they listen to. There should be warning labels on some albums that read: "CAUTION — Two years from now, when you see this CD among your collection, you will be deeply embarrassed."

Kevin Callahan

The plain fact is that everyone has a favorite band that they're ashamed to admit they love. But the best of the cheesy bands are the ones who are self-consciously cheesy. These are the artists who embrace their cheesiness and wield it like a sword. Some of the artists mentioned here fall into that category.



One of them is the Los Angeles-based quartet, Weezer. This is the kind of music that makes me want to join a gaming club. How can it not with lyrics like "I've got the Dungeon Master's guide/I've got 12-sided die." Rivers Cuomo, Brian Bell, Patrick Wilson and [illegible]

"Melrose": One of our guiltiest pleasures leaves the air in May

Jacob Fanning's Soap Chat

Hi soap fans! You'll have to excuse my absence lately but I'm still having a mental breakdown. It's my last semester of college and the walls seem to be closing in. In three months I'll be on my own and have to assume the responsibilities of a... I can't even say it... a full-time adult.

My dream is to land a job at Soap Opera Weekly or Digest and live in a nice, cozy apartment in SoHo. Chances are, though, I'll end up living in a cardboard box with a plum job at Teen Beat magazine, the only other job I'm qualified for. Enough about me, however, let's get down to the business at hand.

I have some sad news for all you "Melrose Place" fans. You might want to sit down for this one. Fox has announced that they are pulling the plug on one of life's guiltiest, not to mention greatest, pleasures. The decision was based on the show's poor ratings and its failure to generate any kind of buzz despite more than a few recent overhauls. At the height of its popularity, "MP" wasn't just a show, it was a pop culture icon, one that was watched by more than 14 million people.

The show, however, was hit hard back in '95 after a slew of regulars, including Marcia Cross (Kimberly) and Courtney Thorne-Smith (Allison), left the show for greener pastures. The mass exodus wasn't entirely to blame though. Somewhere along the line the powers that be got sloppy and the show lost its spark. The writers, in an attempt to pander to a segment of the audience with little or no attention span, pumped out story after story, all of which were pretty lame. The pace became so dizzying and the stories so cliched that even Amanda seemed, dare I say it, tired.

That was, until recently. After watching it last week I have to admit, I could feel myself being pulled back in. It's actually cleaned up quite nicely. Granted, it doesn't hold a candle to the old school episodes of "MP," but it's definitely a close second. The sex is back (not like it was ever gone), the cast is as adorable as ever, the one-liners are still biting and what the show lacks in serious drama (which seems to be the trend nowadays) it makes up for in attitude. Of course this is all "Much Ado About Nothing" now. Come next year, the show that put the "B" back in bitch and turned bed-hopping into a fine art will be no more. The television landscape will certainly be more boring without it.

As a tribute, I'm asking you guys to E-mail me (see address below) some of your favorite moments. Each week I'll publish one that I think represents the true essence of what "MP" is all about. Here are just a few of my favorite moments. Oh, and by the way, look for the series finale to air sometime in May.

• Allison's days as a raging alcoholic. She used to come to work, tanked off her butt and stumble over office furniture. Even Amanda, the Ice Queen herself, pitied the poor thing. It was too funny (mind you, her behavior was funny, not the fact that she was an alcoholic. I don't want 20 letters screaming about how I'm an insensitive jerk).

• Billy and Allison's first kiss. God, that was way back in junior high.

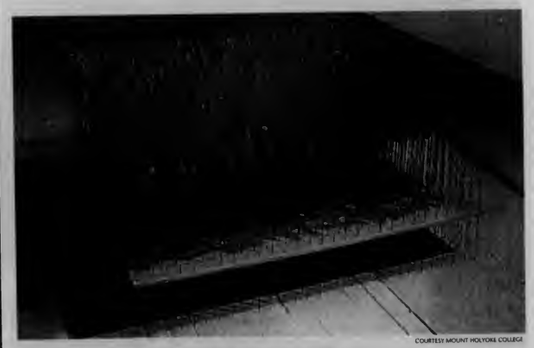
• How about the time (this was during the show's creative slump) when Amanda came down with cancer. For once I thought the show might actually try to tackle some hard- hitting drama. Boy, was I wrong. Apparently, the fans didn't care to see the softer, more vulnerable side of Amanda, so the writers quickly scrapped the idea. Within two weeks she was completely cured. What was so funny was that, during chemotherapy, she would constantly parade around the office in 20-inch heels and a mini skirt that would make even Cher blush. That and she had a 'do to die for.

Let's chat about the folks over in daytime. There's so much to cover yet so little space, hence I'm going to make my comments brief.

"General Hospital": Last I heard the show had put out feelers for a dark woman in her twenties to play Sonny's new flame. According to sources, however, the idea has been squelched. Has the show perhaps found someone else for Sonny to toy with, maybe someone closer to home? Paging a sassy young blonde who eats men for breakfast. Of course I'm talking about Carly. Rumor has it, these two may be ripping off their clothes before you can say, "Jason who?" I'll have more to say about these two next week.

I love Liz and Lucky but their declarations of love, especially the scene just prior to Valentine's Day, really made me want to vomit. A few quick notes: Why is Felicia parading around town in a pair of skin-tight vinyl pants? AJ is a little weasell Someone call the fashion police on Bobbie. Sonny might have bitten off more than he can chew with Carly. If he thought Moreno was dangerous...

"Another World": Alice Barrett-Mitchell (ex-Frankie) is back, but as whom? My guess is she is a pawn of Jordon (you know, the morphing freak of nature who's obsessed with Amanda. Don't even get me started on that one). I absolutely adore Cass and Lila together. What the hell happened to Josie? She used to be a morally upstanding woman, now she lies and schemes at every corner.



"As the World Turns": Some sad news for all you Brad fans. Nick Kokotakis has asked to be released from his contract so that he can give his daughter, who has cerebral palsy, the attention that she needs. I wish him the best of luck. It's nice to know that chivalry still exists.

"The Bold and the Beautiful": Andrea Evans, formerly of "One Life to Live" fame where she played Tina Roberts (the one and only as far as I'm concerned) has joined the show as Amber's mother. It's good to see her back on daytime. As for fiction, can I tell you, I can't stand that bitch who's snuggling up to Rick. She's so annoyingly perfect and perky. Whatever!

"One Life to Live": I'm still fuming over Laura Koffman's (Cassie) dismissal. The woman has been a core part of the show for almost 10 years now (that's my guess) and they give her the boot, just like that. I've always been a huge fan of both Laura and Cassie and this is yet another kick in the face.

"Sunset Beach": Gabi and Father Antonio finally gave into their passion for one another, and in a cave no less. How romantic! That would be my first instinct. You're trapped in a cave with no food or water, no hope of escape, why not just go for it. The problem is, they forgot about that little thing called a surveillance camera (don't ask where it came from). Now Francesca has the tape and is threatening to run to Ricardo if Gabi doesn't cough up the $200,000. Whatever will she do?

Jiggle and Joint to hit Van Meter

COURTESY LAURA LABSWAY

Those crazy guys of Jiggle the Handle bring their crazy tunes to Van Meter (also known for craziness) this weekend.

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

They have performed on the H.O.R.D.E. tour, shared the stage with such artists as Strangefolk, moe, and The Samples, and this coming Saturday night Jiggle the Handle is set to astonish a mostly UMass crowd in the basement of Van Meter.

The band's memorable in-concert improvisations have been attracting quite an amount of attention within the jam- band circuit. So spectacular were their shows, that the band's debut album, Mrs. White's Party, was almost entirely taken from live performances.

Most impressive is the sensational background that the band members come from. Joining lead singer Gary Backstrom is former Max Creek drummer Greg Vanso, former Planet Be keyboardist Paul Wolstencroft, and ex-Hypnotic Clambake bassist Chris Q.

A combination of a dedicated touring schedule and the broadcasting of virtual concerts on the Internet has led Jiggle the Handle to obtain a loyal fan base.

The band's strong points include tracks like, "Fly with the Sun" and "Turn Myself Back Around," which generally turn into free-flowing, exhilarating jams. Don't be surprised if Jiggle the Handle's high energy breaks into a Pink Floyd cover, or if they perform some unreleased material.

Promising act Joint Custody opens, hot off their incredible showcase at "The Big Night." The band is looking to groove the audience with their fun, dancy blend of pop. They are presently recording a follow-up to their very successful debut album, ...the laws, the mids, and the highs, in Boston.

Joint Custody has been gaining a strong following since its creation nearly three years ago. The splendid track, "Winter," off the band's debut album has matured since its release into a finely-polished and brilliantly-composed song. Joint Custody is one of the most talented and exciting acts to come out of UMass in a long time. It is the perfect act to warm the audience up for Jiggle the Handle.

HERO and Kay Jah Funk entertain Van Meter Friday night, while Joint Custody opens for Jiggle the Handle this coming Saturday, Feb. 27. Tickets for both shows are available at the door.

~Film Clips~

A selection of films playing in the local area:

BLAST FROM THE PAST (dir. Hugh Wilson, with Brendan Fraser, Alicia Silverstone, playing at Mountain Farms) A man born and raised in an isolated fallout shelter by parents stuck in the '50s ventures out into crazy, '90s California to find a wife. It's at once a ridiculous and interesting idea for a movie. But the film, despite the affecting performance of Brendan Fraser, is not brave enough to use its available strangeness to support much more than an ordinary boy–meets–girl–with–complications romantic comedy. C– (Rob Roensch)

A CIVIL ACTION (dir. Steven Zaillian, with John Travolta, Robert Duvall, playing at Mountain Farms) Based on Jonathan Harr's bestseller, the story of Boston personal injury attorney Jan Schlichtmann taking on two large corporations translates well to film. Director Zaillian keeps the movie taut and tense, and elicits terrific performances from Travolta, Duvall, William H. Macy and Kathleen Quinlan. One of the most well–crafted films to come out of Hollywood in a while. A– (Kevin Monahan)

ELIZABETH (dir. Shekhar Kapur, with Cate Blanchett, Geoffrey Rush, playing at Amherst) It does not matter that the history is not entirely correct in Elizabeth. The film goes instead for atmosphere and power, and succeeds because of the acting and bravura mis–en–scene. An incredible supporting cast and sumptuous direction sets the film apart from usual English costume dramas. But it is the pale–faced, chameleon–eyed Blanchett, transforming herself from frail to iron–strong, who impresses the most, and molds the movie like the Queen herself: naive at first, but ultimately very powerful. B+ (Bryan McAllister)

MESSAGE IN A BOTTLE (dir. Luis Mandoki, with Kevin Costner, Robin Wright Penn, playing at Mountain Farms) Mark Message in a Bottle "Return to sender." The Kevin Costner film has a chance to be a poetic and creative romance, but instead resorts to humdrum formulas and tired melodrama. Inept acting and hopelessly slow direction mar it further. Beautiful photography and the presence of Paul Newman are the only highlights. D (Adam Martignetti)

PAYBACK (dir. Brian Helgeland, with Mel Gibson, Maria Bello, playing at Mountain Farms) Payback is a movie about violence — about guns and fights and people killing each other. But the violence is only part of the bleak world this film creates, mixing lifeless photography and a tired but strong performance by Mel Gibson. Payback sets its goals low, but hits most of them. B (R.R.)

SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE (dir John Madden, with Joseph Fiennes, Gwyneth Paltrow, playing at Academy of Music). Art and life have had a chaotic history, alternatively frustrating and inspiring each other. In Shakespeare in Love, the Bard (Joseph Fiennes) is suffering writer's block at the dawn of the first performance of the yet–unwritten Romeo and Juliet, until he finds his muse in Paltrow. Wit, enchantment, high comedy and passion follow. A marvelous supporting cast, led by Judi Dench and Geoffrey Rush, and an impeccable script, co–written by noted playwright Tom Stoppard. A (B.M.)

VARSITY BLUES (dir. Brian Robbins, with James Van Der Beek, Jon Voight, playing at Mountain Farms) Part inspirational sports story, part crappy MTV–sex comedy, Varsity Blues spreads itself in many directions, and gets a strong performance from Van Der Beek as Mox, a second– string quarterback thrown into the spotlight. Mox does a slight rebellion off West Canaan, much to the frustration of his Bill Parcells–like coach, Bud Kilmer (Voight), and here's where the stupid antics clear and the inspirational stuff takes over, to great effect. B (Rob Roensch)

WAKING NED DIVINE (dir Kirk Jones, with Ian Bannen, David Kelly, playing at Pleasant St.) Writer/director Jones provides wonderfully bizarre characters in this little film about an unknown lottery winner in a small Irish town. A marvelous ensemble cast, particularly Ian Bannen and Michael O'Sullivan, lead this alluring and enchanting film about the little quirks of life, the twists of fate, and the ties of friendship. B (A.M.)

know your woman's moods; choosing the appropriate type of candy means knowing what she needs.

If you haven't spoken to her since that fateful eve, she needs some hard core candy lovin'. I recommend giving her the best that money can buy. She needs gourmet chocolate mousse served in a chocolate candy shell with a strawberry garnish, bedecked with flecks of gold which you can strain out of any bottle of Goldschlagger. Nothing less will do. You should probably serve it while laying prostrate before her.

Once you have been allowed to speak with her, you have reached a critical period. Although her desires have been satiated somewhat, you need to do some follow-up work or your mousse will have been in vain.

I recommend Reese's Peanut Butter Cups — many, many peanut butter cups. She should be eating peanut butter cups for breakfast, lunch and dinner. I was told last year that you can buy them at the Munchy Store. If you are a true man you will hike the highest mountains and swim across the deepest oceans to find the holy grail of peanut butter cups. If you consider yourself "just a guy," any local purveyor will do.

She will soon tire of the peanut butter, and it will then be time to consider fudge. Fudge is tricky. I don't like nuts, but some girls do. They're hairy... oh, shoot, wrong kind of nut. Anyway, your girl may like her fudge smooth and sexy, or she make like that nutty edge that says, "I was a squirrel in a past life." You need to know your woman. I can't help you there.

If you surmount the challenge of the fudge, you are almost back in the loop. At this point you're probably holding hands again and maybe even pecking on the cheek. You need some mini M&Ms. They come in pretty colors like dusty rose, they are light and crunchy, the chocolate flavor is a little less pronounced. She doesn't need as much chocolate now because she can imagine you giving her some action.

Now that you have won your way back into her heart, it is time to take her out for a nice dinner. Movie options are slim in these parts nowadays and moonlit nights are still chilly, but perhaps you should give her the Milky Way. You should know by now if she wants dark, regular or lite.

As for the sex which will most likely end your evening, I can't give you any advice that I might be held liable for. All I can say is, go with your gut and keep a Snicker's bar at the bedside. At least Snicker's really satisfies.

■ bell

"Artie Boy" one, the one where Slater strips down to a leotard and dances ballet, and the first high school episode, when Zack pulls out a life-size poster of Kelly Kapowski and announces his goal in life.

Most of the episodes, after all, had to do with one of the following:

1. Zack scheming to get out of class, win over a girl, embarrass Valley, or make money.
2. Zack trying to win over Kelly.
3. Zack competing with Slater to win over Kelly or some other girl.
4. Screech professing his love to Lisa, and Lisa denying it.
5. Mr. Belding trying to be part of the group.

Now, forget Gandhi, Mother Theresa and the Keebler Elf. I'll readily admit that Zack Morris was my true idol. He was always thinking of a new scheme to get his way — whether it was enlisting pal Screech, hit by lightning, to predict the answers on a test, or acting as principal and calling all the "prettiest" girls to the office. Played with a perfect mix of confidence and boyish earnestness by Mark-Paul Gosselaar, he also had the coolest hair ever. But more importantly, when not with his dream girl Kelly, he had a new girlfriend in every episode. He was a symbol, an icon to us budding rebels without a cause.

And then there's Kelly Kapowski. Before she had plastic surgery and got all mean on "90210," Tiffani-Amber Thiessen was the Girl Next Door. Kelly was saccharine sweet and innocent; she basically defined perkiness. Most of "Saved by the Bell" revolved around Zack's pursuit of her, and therefore, the episode where college boy Jeff takes her away remains the second most moving episode ever taped in TV history.

The first most moving episode ever, however, belongs to Jessie Spano. Jessie, or "Mama," as A.C. Slater affectionately calls her, was easily the most annoying person on the show, but you had to like her conviction anyway. She was our feminist, our environmentalist, our whatever-cause-we-can-think-of-ist.

Elizabeth Berkley, pre-Showgirls, did just the right amount of overacting, especially in the famous sequence when Jessie overdoses on sleeping pills. Who was not silenced, teeth clenched, when Berkley gave her "There's never any time" speech?

Which brings us to her boyfriend, A.C. Slater (Mario Lopez). "Saved by the Bell" wouldn't be "Saved by the Bell" without Slater. Muscle-bound, curly-haired, macho Slater was always Zack's chief competition, but mostly his best friend. Hardcore "Bell" fans know that A.C. stands for Albert Clifford.

Which doesn't bring us to Lisa Turtle at all, but she's next anyway. I always preferred earlier Lisa to later Lisa, but Lisa was still the classic one-joke character. The girl liked to shop a lot, and that was funny 'cause all girls do.

And with no segue attempt whatsoever, there is Samuel "Screech" Powers, the Greatest Dork of All Time. You never knew exactly what Screech was going to say, but you were pretty sure it would somehow involve bugs, bunyons and Lisa Turtle. Screech was dumb but smart; clueless yet brilliant; unloved but lovable.

Other characters filled the Bayside world just as memorably, like Mr. Belding, Mr. Dewey, Mr. Tuttle, Stacey and Leon Caroti, the Zefferelli twins, Ox, Miss Simpson, Mrs. Wentworth and Max. Then there were the famous guest stars, like Tori Spelling, who marvelously played Screech's only girlfriend, Violet Bickerstaff. Other cameos were from Scott Wolf, Denise Richards, Patrick Muldoon, Soleil Moon Frye, and yes, Casey Kasem (two classic episodes — "The Sprain" and the one where Zack dreams he's a rock star).

There's so much more to talk about, but I'll finally mention the best part about "Saved by the Bell" — the fact that it made no sense whatsoever. Not only the plots, but these confusions and contrivances:

- There was an earlier Disney channel version of the show originally called "Good Morning, Miss Bliss," starring Haley Mills. When it was moved to NBC, Mr. Belding moved with it, Mikey and Nicki were dropped, and Jessie and Kelly were added, all without any explanation whatsoever.

In fact, in that famous sleeping pill episode, Jessie refers to Zack being her best friend all throughout her early school days. Yet she was nowhere to be seen in the original version. Same thing goes for Kelly when Zack announces, in the first episode of the new version, that she's always been his dream girl.

- "Saved by the Bell" was one of many shows where all the main characters are always the same class.
- There was apparently only one hallway, and one set of lockers, in the whole school.
- These lockers should also be noted for being amazingly easy to stuff large things into, like people. You could also jump from one locker to another — from the inside. Also, you could fit Lisa's entire wardrobe into them and be able to open them with a remote control.
- Zack's dad was played by a different actor repeatedly.
- Storylines really never carried over to the next episode.
- Zack never studied and failed all his tests, yet got into Yale solely on the basis of his S.A.T.s.
- In the last season, Thiessen and Berkley wanted to leave the show, so some episodes were taped with a new character, Tori, a motorcycle girl. Therefore, there were some episodes during this season with Kelly and Jessie but not Tori, and some episodes with only Tori, yet storylines continued like there was no difference.

Sadly, "Saved by the Bell" is now depressing from syndication, although its spirit lives on with the equally ridiculous, in fact much too ridiculous, "Saved by the Bell — the New Class." But how can any sequel, or any show, match the wonderful cheesiness of an episode that has the entire class singing a song called "Artie Boy" to Slater's dead lizard? We'll miss you too, "Saved by the Bell." If you can only have it as a model, you'll be alright.

"Baby One More Time." She's beautiful, sexy, thin and, most importantly, she can't sing — all the ingredients for super-stardom.

3. Covers/Sampling

The '90s biggest fad: take an old, cultish song and transform it to a hip new beat. Puff Daddy, Jay-Z, Tupac, Busta Rhymes all are kings of the sample, and virtually every band has its own cover.

4. "Buffy the Vampire Slayer"

Besides "The Simpsons," it's TV's smartest comedy, with Sarah Michelle Gellar as the ass-kicking vampire slayer and Joss Whedon's consistently creative writing.

5. Adam Sandler

The new king of dumb comedy. Watch for his latest, Big Daddy, out this summer.

6. Mario Kart (or any video game)

There's a myth that kids play the largest amount of video games. If you're in college, you know this is entirely untrue.

7. SportsCenter

Not that the show is cheesy, but it is entirely cheesy when you watch it twice in the same night, even when you've seen all the highlights already.

8. Boy Bands

The Backstreet Boys are back, alright.

8. Retro

We've brought back disco and swing dancing. I can't wait till I'm older and breakdancing and "the running man" are back in style.

9. The Spice Girls

And Jewel, Natalie Imbruglia, the chick who sings "Just a Little Crush," and basically any beautiful girl who can handle a microphone.

10. Things Involving Angels

City of Angels, "Touched by an Angel," "Angels in the Outfield" are only a few of the despicably melodramatic, weepy additions to pop culture. Also included: self-help books.

The Art of Cheesiness

day with buttered toast, hash browns, eggs (over easy), and pancakes, just like when I was on the team. Maybe that was why my butt tended to hit the river bottom.

It was time for a petty indulgence: parking in the Campus Center Garage. It's like pouring money into a cement pit, but it feels so good. I attended my second class — but I daydreamed the whole time.

For an ultra-late lunch, it had to be the one place in town to get a creative sandwich — the Black Sheep. Shall I compare the Black Sheep Baguette to a summer's day? Pesto, fresh mozzarella and juicy sun-dried tomatoes are layered on a fresh baguette dripping with balsamic vinegar and olive oil. The Mannes Report also recommends the Valley Girl: smoked turkey, kale, honey mustard, and brie. And we're talking about a lot of brie. Portions are so generous that I have no idea how they turn a profit. Tip: check out the cheese counter. I like to ask for the cheese that smells like old socks. Reminds me of those days on the team.

After a nap, I picked up my friend Courtney. No time for dinner, but that was fine. We were two blonde babes ready to party, so we decided against Barsie's, where we would have had to compete against all the other blondes. The traditional, more exclusive atmosphere of Boltwood's Tavern beckoned. We sat at the refreshingly small bar and ordered drinks, a gin and a "whatever," followed by more drinks. The Mannes Report would describe them as "strong." So strong, in fact, that we almost missed a crucial scene on "Ally McBeal." Luckily, the snazzily-dressed manager had overheard our musings, and pointed out the Ally/Billy kiss. Tip: Try Lord Jefferey's Favorite: hot coffee with Grand Marnier, Benedictine, and whipped cream. A hell of a way to beat a cold.

I had bought a pack of Djarhums for the occasion. Courtney and I sat in the car and smoked really great, really strong, sweet-tipped clove cigarettes. Head rush! The Mannes Report reports that driving a stick shift while smoking a clove looks not only clever, but slightly dangerous. Exactly what I was going for.

Matt Sharp are without a doubt icons in the field of Dork rock. By the way, Sharp left Weezer to pursue his side project — The Rentals — full-time. The Rentals' first hit single, "Friends of P," is another guilty pleasure. The Rentals' new album is due in stores soon on Madonna's Maverick label (a subsidiary of Reprise records—a Time Warner Company).

Weezer's first album, produced by The Cars' Ric Ocasek, yielded the singles "Undone—The Sweater Song" ("Hate to see you lying there in your Superman skivvies, lying on the floor, I've come undone."), "Buddy Holly" ("What's with these homies dissin' my girl? Why do they gotta front?") and "Say It Ain't So" ("This wave is a waterslide away from me that takes you further every day, so be cool"). Everyone bought this album. Most sold it back. No one bought their second album, Pinkerton. (Well, I did. But I don't count.)

"El Scorcho" was a marginal radio success, but was far from the best song on the album. "The Good Life," "Across the Sea," and "Why Bother?" were pieces of insanely catchy pop brilliance. These three songs are far better than anything on Weezer, but the dumb songs on Pinkerton took their toll on the album. Most notably among the less favorable songs on the second album are "No Other One" and "Pink Triangle," the latter of which is about Cuomo's hopeless crush on a girl who turns out to be a lesbian.

Another band that shamelessly embraces the cheese is pseudo-punk/pop group, that dog. Their second album, Totally Crushed Out, is the very definition of cheese, representing everything that sucked about high school crushes. Very adolescent: "He's Kissing Christian" was a sort-of hit on "120 Minutes," but that's about as far as it went. Made up of Anna Waronker, Petra and Rachel Hayden, and Tony Maxwell, that dog has since disbanded.

It's difficult to be this shameless when it comes to music like this. If you'll excuse me, I have to take out my Christian Death CD and listen to Letters to Cleo.

"Friends," "ER" and NBC achieve Feb. sweep wins

Every TV season has its highs and lows. However, most series save their big-time achievements for three distinct times during the year. TV sweeps month arrives in billions of homes across the country and floods American televisions with the networks' most accomplished piece of drama, comedy and variety shows that they have to offer.

The months of the year that are usually deemed as optimal airing times are November, February and May. As February Sweeps wind down and shows ease into re-runs until May, viewers are still on the edge of their feet in anticipation for more. There's no worse feeling than looking in the TV guide and seeing that upcoming episodes of your favorite shows are repeats, sometimes for weeks on end.

However, in my opinion, the public has nothing to complain about. It's been quite a month, and in the tradition of TV Guide's "Cheers and Jeers," this is a list of the big- time winners and losers on the tube.

Winner: "Mad About You" — The popular NBC series is on its way out, and in its final season there has been the same quality acting, writing and overall enjoyment that has been so crucial to its persistence. Perhaps the saddest thing about "Mad About You" going off the air is that it is still in its prime. It powers the NBC Monday night line-up, and is receiving its best ratings ever. It is unfortunate that next February we will not have this show to revere.

Loser: "Home Improvement" — Someone just shoot it please! As Soul Asylum sings, "Put me out of my misery. I'd do it for you would you do it for me?" I think Tim Allen is screaming these lyrics as he is writing his awful series: it's dragging along in its final season with no legs pushing it at all. The fact is that usually when a series announces that it is leaving, the last few episodes get better, and there is more of a sense of closure. In this case, the episodes seem to be getting worse, and were highlighted by last Tuesday's episode where Jill (Patricia Richardson) has cancer surgery. Isn't this supposed to be a comedy?

Winner: "Dawson's Creek" — If you follow what's been going on, you'll know that it's been great. The excellent acting of Joshua Jackson, who plays Pacey Whitter, was highlighted by a scene where he spit at a teacher, exclaiming "No Sir, that is spitting in the face of the entire educational system."

Also Joey's (Katie Holmes) new boyfriend Jack has revealed that he's gay, in an excellent turn of events that broke stereotypes, and moved teenage diversity into a new level. Hey, now that Joey's single, do you think I have a shot? I'll have to call Kevin Williamson.

Loser: "Melrose Place" — FOX finally announced that this will be the last season for the night–time soap opera that has lost too much of its following to be on TV anymore.

Winner: "Spin City" — After winning all sorts of awards, the show is receiving the credit that it deserves, and the guest stars are piling in. This month, guest spots included visits from Christopher Lloyd and Priscilla Presley.

Loser: "Becker" — I think there's a rule with Ted Danson. One out of every 10 projects he does ends up in success. He was briefly in Saving Private Ryan this summer, so you won't see any quality work from Ted for a long time. Here's a hint to the two people out there that actually watch this show: It's going to be canceled.

Winner: "ER" — The writers did an excellent job marketing the show's highlighted episode of George Clooney's exit, and consequently, it remained on top of the charts.

Loser: "Storm of the Century" — The marketers did an awful job trying to sell this ABC mini-series, and airing the last part of it on Thursday night against George Clooney's final episode of "ER" was about as brilliant as Pauly Shore.

Winner: "Friends" — My pick for best comedy of the year. "Friends" has been as good this year, if not better, than its first year on the air. They've finally changed the plot from Ross and Rachel obsessing over each other to a more funny relationship between Chandler and Monica. I have been saying for years that all this show needed to do to get better was to expand its horizons. The writers finally did that, and it's much better.

Loser: "Friends" — Here's a hint NBC: when you advertise that there will be a wedding proposal, you better have a wedding. Last week's episode was one of the few disappointments of "Friend"'s excellent season. The hyped– up wedding proposal was a farce, and was used as a joke. Think of it this way — what would happen if Trey Parker and Matt Stone decided to advertise that they are going to reveal who Eric Cartman's father is, and instead of doing that, they air a half–hour long episode of "Terrence and Phillip." The results would be devastating? People would stop watching the show, and it would just get worse. Oh wait…

Winner: "Frasier" — Woody Harrelson stopped by to revive his character from "Cheers." Need anymore be said?

Loser: "South Park" — A month full of repeats? Good idea, that way no one will watch.

Winner: George Clooney — He was allowed to leave "ER" with dignity and his fans adore him. You can't help but wish him luck in his pursuit of a movie career.

Loser: Scott Bairstow (Ned from "Party of Five") — Like Clooney, Bairstow is leaving the show, but the writers decided he was going to leave because he was going to beat his girlfriend, Julie (Neve Campbell) to the point where I'm pretty sure that the viewers think he's evil. Tough break man!

Winner: "The Simpsons" — Four weeks and four new episodes brought more excellence to the show that viewers in a recent Entertainment Weekly poll say is the greatest comedy series of all time.

Loser: "The PJ's" — Hey Eddie Murphy! Why don't you just go back to your rock and we'll call you when it's time to re-make The Wizard of Oz with added flatulence. Your show is horrible.

Winner: Monday Night TV Line Up — Who needs "Monday Night Football?" Shows such as "Mad About You" and "Ally McBeal" have proven that there's something on TV for everyone, and eased the pain of not being able to watch the Patriots lose on a Monday night.

Loser: Friday Night TV Line Up — Hey for those of us who have no lives, we'd like to have something else to watch on TV besides the Olson Twins and "Sabrina the Teenage Witch." Actually, after thinking about this, I'm wondering who the real loser is.

Kresse forced to take the good with the bad in a great season

By David Droschak
Associated Press

GREENSBORO, N.C. — These should be the best of times for John Kresse.

After all, his College of Charleston is ranked 17th in the nation, riding a 22-game winning streak and the big favorite to win this week's Southern Conference tournament and receive the league's automatic bid to the NCAA postseason.

But the coach hasn't been with his team for several days. Kresse has been in New York with his 80-year-old mother, Mildred Kresse Seeley, who is dying of liver cancer.

"My mother is weakening day-by-day," said Kresse, who flew to New York on Monday to be with his mother before the tournament starts.

Assistant coaches Jim Yarbrough, Ben Betts and Chris Evans ran practice the last few days and Kresse will fly to Greensboro early today to scout his team's opponent.

The Cougars, the top seed in the South Division, don't open play until tomorrow, taking on the winner of the VMI-Furman game.

"My mind is certainly with the team, and with the program at the Southern Conference tournament, yet my prayers and my thoughts are certainly back home," Kresse said.

The recent trip to New York was Kresse's second in two weeks.

"John has invested 20 years of his life here," Yarbrough said by telephone from the Charleston, S.C., campus. "He has taught us all to be winners and these you men have invested a lot in their lives to be at this particular point. It's a shame that for John it's not as enjoyable and for the players to not be able to have every day with him.

"You know, a lot of teams are ready to pack up the balls and every day is a grind and they can't wait to get it over. For us, every minute of every day we love being together. At every pregame meal and every practice you don't want it to end."

Kresse, who entered the season with 465 career wins and was third in winning percentage among active coaches, said his situation shouldn't affect his team too much. His senior-dominated team has been around the block and experienced a number of situations throughout their careers.

The Cougars (25-2) piled up a perfect 16-0 regular-season slate in the Southern Conference and haven't lost since Dec. 4. They have wins over No. 14 North Carolina and Massachusetts on their resume.

The highest-ranked team to enter the Southern Conference tournament since Davidson was No. 11 under Terry Holland in 1970, Charleston has won this season in a variety of ways.

The Cougars rallied from a 15-point deficit at Davidson to beat the defending conference champs. The team has also had some close wins at places like Wofford and Georgia Southern.

"The pressure from our winning streak has mounted greatly, but my players have handled it so well," Kresse said. "They are an experienced group of seniors. I have eight seniors and I don't know of anyone in the country who has more players who have been through more wars.

"They are cool as cucumbers and they practice hard and stay together," added Kresse, who has won at least 23 games in 15 of the 20 years at the school.

Wofford had Charleston on the ropes at home on Jan. 25, only to see the Cougars win 70-65.

"We were up five with nine minutes to play at our place, the crowd was going crazy, my guys are high-fiving coming off the floor at a timeout and Charleston with five seniors just kind of walked over to the bench and yawned," Wofford coach Richard Johnson said. "It was like, 'Big deal, this is a minor blip and we're going to win.'"

"They do that because they are very deep, they're experienced and they've been there. That is why they went through the league undefeated. They are unflappable."

Suttons making a big mark for TCU

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — Amy Sutton is No. 11, the shooting guard with the tan religious bracelet. Jill Sutton is No. 12, the point guard who wears a blue one.

That's all the help you get trying to distinguish the identical twin sophomore starters for Texas Christian.

The Sutton sisters provide the Horned Frogs (15-9, 7-5 Western Athletic Conference) with a quality backcourt. Combined, they average 25.3 of the team's 76.6 points per game. Individually, Amy scores 14.4 points and Jill averages 11.

They are among at least 17 sets of twins playing Division I women's basketball. While Kelly and Coco Miller of No. 14 Georgia may be the best, it's hard to imagine any two who are closer than the Suttons.

The 19-year-olds live together, take the same classes and are best friends. They're both early risers and don't like to stay out late.

They're both good students who share the same major — education. Both aspire to become basketball coaches.

They have a joint checking account and share all their clothes. That's why they don't see a need to exchange birthday or Christmas gifts — a plan that makes perfect sense to them but bewilders their friends.

They are devoted to remaining mirror images that if one wants a new hairstyle, the other does the same to avoid the chance "one of us will look bad," Amy says.

Although both are quick to smile, their personalities differ somewhat. They don't always like the same music or laugh at the same jokes. Amy, who is older by less than a minute, is more talkative.

But the similarities far outweigh the differences.

"We're not overall outgoing without each other, so I guess it's good that we've always had each other so we'll have at least one friend around," Jill says, laughing.

The farthest apart they've been is 1,000 miles for 17 hours — four months ago, Amy was on campus while Jill represented TCU at the WAC media day in Las Vegas. Jill was invited because she had the better freshman year. Amy, though, is doing better this season.

Both take losing hard, even to each other. Asked what they compete at, they quickly said: "Everything." In unison.

"Amy and Jill have always pushed each other," said their mother, Brenda Hankey. "The thing I was always thankful for is that they were always so close, in their grades and in their abilities in basketball. They were never jealous of each other. They've always supported each other."

Out of uniform and without their bracelets — emblazoned with "WWJD" for "What Would Jesus Do?" — it's practically impossible tell who's who. They're used to being asked, "Which one are you?" and almost always give the real answer.

"Everyone asks us if it bothers us," Amy says. "But it doesn't."

Once in high school they switched classes, only to be given away by their classmates' giggles. They haven't tried anything since, but they are plotting a prank on their teammates.

"They think they know how to tell us apart," Amy says. "We'll have to do a little test to see just how well they know us."

Opposing coaches and referees need not fear. The Suttons promise they won't switch jerseys at the start of the WAC tournament or at halftime of a game when one is in foul trouble.

Their word will have to do because even their playing styles are similar. Amy is probably a slightly better rebounder, Jill the better passer.

But the 5-foot-9 guards both dribble well with either hand and neither can be left alone from the outside. Jill set the school freshman record with 34 points last year; Amy set the school record with 39 points this year.

Both wear knee pads because they play so aggressively. Amy also has worn a mouthpiece since getting a tooth knocked out at last year's WAC tournament; Jill started wearing one, too, but recently gave it up.

On the court together, a sixth sense seems at work.

"I kind of feel like Amy knows that if she wants to cut to the basket, I'll throw it to her," Jill says. "We're thinking on the same level."

Braves seem to have found a fifth starter in lefty Chen

KISSIMMEE, Fla. (AP) — Bruce Chen, just 21 but already drawing comparisons to Tom Glavine, seems well qualified to join the Atlanta Braves' magnificent rotation.

Well, not quite — his golf game stinks.

"The last time I went, I shot a 110," Chin said, smiling meekly. "And we were playing mulligans, too."

Chen, a native of Panama, only took up golf last year. Clearly, he is not yet ready to join the elite foursome that includes Tom Glavine, Greg Maddux, John Smoltz and Kevin Millwood.

"I would probably be on the fifth hole while they're on the 12th hole," Chen joked. "I would like to go out with them. But first, I've got to catch up with their pitching, then I'll catch up with their golf. I don't want to be out there on the course with them going, 'Gee, Bruce, you're killing us. We have to be home by 5.'"

Give him time. Already, Chen has defied the odds by rising from Double-A at the beginning of last season to a likely spot in the Braves rotation behind Glavine (20-6), Maddux (18-9) and Smoltz (17-3) — all Cy Young winners.

An opening was created when the Braves traded 16-game winner Denny Neagle to Cincinnati during the offseason, allowing Kevin Millwood (17-8) to take the fourth starter slot.

So, how does Chen cope with joining a group that combined to win 72 games a year ago?

"Actually, I'm not feeling any pressure," he said, sitting in the dugout after a spring training workout at the Disney World complex. "I think I'm more relaxed and more loose this spring training. Last year was my first spring [in the big-league camp]. Now, I know what to expect and what level of baseball they play."

After a taste of the big leagues last spring, Chen returned to Class AA Greenville, where he went 13-7 with a 3.29 ERA. He was promoted to Triple-A Richmond, pitching only four games but well enough (2-1, 1.88 ERA) to earn a late-season trip to Atlanta.

With the Braves running away with the NL East, Chen was able to make four starts in the big leagues. The left-hander was 2-0 with a 3.98 ERA, his poise and style drawing comparisons to Glavine in the early years of his career.

"Any time you're compared to Tom Glavine, that's great," Chen said. "But everyone is different. He knows what he can do, and I know what works for me. I'm not trying to copy him. I want to learn from him. I want to know why he's successful. But I also want to be myself."

The defending NL Cy Young winner acknowledged the similarities in their pitching styles, though Chen's best pitch is a curve while Glavine relies more on his change-up. Personality-wise, they resemble each other as well.

"He's got a great demeanor, a great presence on the mound," said Glavine, renowned for his stoic demeanor. "At the same time, he doesn't have one luxury that John and I had when we first came up. When we got up here, we expected to lose."

Glavine and Smoltz both came to Atlanta in the late-80s, when the Braves were a last-place team that could afford to groom its young pitchers.

Glavine went 7-17 with a 4.54 ERA as a rookie; Smoltz also struggled (2-7, 5.48) during his initial big-league season.

"When guys come in now, they're joining a winning ballclub that's expected to win and they're expected to be part of that," Glavine said. "They don't have the luxury of struggling like we did or saying, 'So what, it's not about winning. It's all about winning now."

Henson's impending 700th win sure to place him among legends

LAS CRUCES, N.M. (AP) — There are times when Lou Henson wonders why he can't shake his craving for competition.

"Every now and then I think, this is ridiculous," Henson said. "I'm putting too much pressure on myself. It's not like I'm trying to save my job, I'm not 35. I don't have four kids [to support]."

What Henson, who turned 67 last month, still has is the ability to turn out winning basketball teams. He's done it so well for 36 years that he's one win away from becoming only the 13th coach in Division I to win 700 games.

Now in his second stint at New Mexico State, Henson's career record is at 699-353 going into Thursday's game against Utah State in Las Cruces.

The impending 700th win has become a major topic in New Mexico. House and Senate members in the state Legislature gave Henson a standing ovation when he visited this week.

Henson's road to 700 started 44 years ago with his graduation from New Mexico State.

"I was trying to decide whether I wanted to coach or go into administration," Henson said. "I was thinking about getting a high school job somewhere."

Henson was a high school coach in the late '50s and early '60s. But the legacy of the dapper-dressing, success-driven and congenial Henson is what he accomplished since then at Hardin-Simmons, Illinois and New Mexico State.

He came out of retirement last season to take over the program at his alma mater. NMSU athletic director Jim Paul replaced Neil McCarthy with Henson, who agreed to be the interim coach for a salary of $1 a month. After the season, Henson signed a four-year contract that will run through his 70th birthday.

hoist the Stanley Cup.

If the Bruins, as they appear to be, are looking towards the future and committed to the youth movement, then (I'm holding back tears) they should, gulp, trade their captain, Ray Bourque. Even though Bourque plays like the youngest 39–year–old I've ever seen, he has openly acknowledged that retirement is right around the corner, say two to three years.

There are a number of teams out there who could use Captain Ray's services and I'm sure the B's could land a ton of young talent and/or draft picks in return.

Wasn't Detroit recently coveting a defenseman? I believe this column had Washington's Mark Tinordi possibly heading to Motown last week. Well, Tinordi sprained his ankle this past weekend and will be out four to six weeks. That pretty much kills that deal.

So, if the Bruins ever decide to give Bourque a chance at a cup via a trade, don't be surprised to see the game's best defenseman dealt to the Red Wings and finally grabbing that elusive ring. Detroit has enough talent and youth in its system to sport two contenders and I'm sure it would be willing to spare a little in exchange for a three–peat. Just imagine Bourque circling Joe Louis Arena with the cup. Boston sports management at it's finest, eh?

Lakers fire Del Harris

By John Nadel
Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — The Los Angeles Lakers, mired at 5-10 12 games through the abbreviated NBA season, fired coach Del Harris yesterday.

Jerry West, the team's vice president of basketball operations, said that one of two assistants — Kurt Rambis or Larry Drew — will handle the coaching duties for the rest of the season.

The team, which has lost three straight, made the announcement as it was adding Dennis Rodman to what on paper is one of the more talented rosters in the league.

West said longtime assistant Bill Bertka will handle the head coaching duties tonight against the winless Los Angeles Clippers before a decision is made on Drew or Rambis, both former Lakers.

"Particularly for me, the thing that makes it so awkward is that Del has been a friend for many years," West said. "The direction of a team is very important. We do feel like we have the talent here.

"I just feel the last two games we've played have not been acceptable. We just felt like there was a deterioration. I talked to [owner] Jerry Buss this morning and we just felt like the time was right now."

The Lakers lost three games in three days in three different cities.

The were beaten 92-89 Sunday at Seattle; 117-113 in overtime at Denver on Monday night, and 93-83 at Vancouver on Tuesday night.

Denver's win was only its second in 10 games this season and the Grizzlies had never beaten Los Angeles in 12 previous games between the teams.

Most of a team that reached the Western Conference finals before being swept by the Utah Jazz last spring is back, but the Lakers have been on-again, off-again since the start of the campaign.

Harris, 61, was in his fifth season as Lakers head coach and has been under criticism from many directions.

However, as recently as Tuesday night star center Shaquille O'Neal said the team's problems weren't the coach's fault.

Harris has 556 career wins to rank among the top 20 coaches of all time. He previously coached the Houston Rockets and Milwaukee Bucks.

When asked if he had spoken with former Chicago coach Phil Jackson or anyone else as a long-term successor, West replied, "We have not talked to anyone. This happened so quickly."

Only two days before the firing, former Lakers point guard Nick Van Exel, traded to Denver following last season, called Harris a "cancer on the Lakers." Harris and Van Exel had a stormy relationship over the last four seasons.

tions in her final games in Maroon and White.

The Bronx, N.Y. native led the Minutewomen in rebounding the past two years, as she averaged 6.8 and 6.5 per game respectively in the '97-98, and '96-'97 seasons.

But success at the collegiate level did not always come easy for Rayside, as she played minimally her freshman year, when she averaged 0.9 points, and 2.8 rebounds per contest.

"I was overwhelmed when I first got here," Rayside said. "The hardest adjustment of college came in regards to basketball. The level of competition and the rigors of practice were hard to get used to initially."

The tools were there, as Rayside posted exceptional numbers at the High School of Fashion Industries in New York.

Her senior year at Fashion can be best be described as dominating, as she poured in 19.4 points, grabbed 15.0 rebounds and handed out 3.4 assists a game.

Rayside began to show flashes of her well-rounded capabilities in her sophomore year at UMass, as her minutes began to increase due to O'Brien's newfound confidence in her play.

The third year turned out to be the charm for Rayside, on both a personal and team level.

Rayside improved her scoring production from the previous year increasing from 4.7 to 8.1, and UMass qualified for the NCAA tournament for the second time in school history.

The Minutewomen appeared to be likely candidates to return to the Big Dance this year, but at 16-13, it seems they will have to win the A-10 tournament to participate.

To get through three games in three days, O'Brien will be relying heavily on physical, Inside play — Rayside's specialty.

Therefore, if one is searching for an unknown entity on this squad that may be able to carry UMass over the mountain, look no further than Rayside.

Yolanda Rayside and the rest of the Massachusetts women's basketball team will open up A-10 tourney play this weekend against the winner of the Rhode Island/ Xavier game.

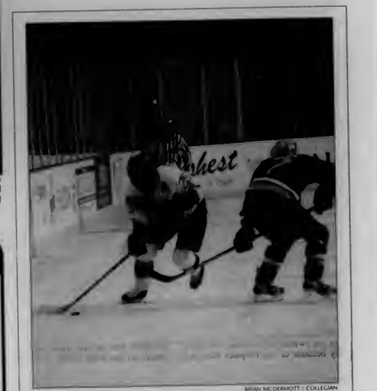
Tyson sent off to total isolation

By Derill Holly
Associated Press

ROCKVILLE, Md. — Mike Tyson was ordered yesterday to remain in solitary confinement for 20 more days after throwing a television in a recreation room at the Montgomery County jail.

Tyson has been in administrative segregation since Friday and won't return to the regular jail population until mid-March. He also lost phone and visiting privileges and won't be allowed to participate in group activities at the facility. He will be in an isolated environment for 23 hours a day.

Tyson faced accusations of disorderly conduct, destroying property and assaulting a correctional officer who was allegedly struck with shards of plastic from the television.



Tyson has not had contact with the other inmates since Friday, when he was placed in solitary confinement after his alleged outburst. Before then, he had begun a one-year sentence in a cell among the jail's regular population of inmates who are awaiting trial or serving sentences of 18 months or less.

He was sentenced Feb. 5 after pleading no contest to charges he assaulted two men following a minor traffic accident in August, but he has until March 7 to appeal the sentence. Tyson's lawyer, Paul Kemp, said he would decide on the appeal by the end of the week. Kemp said Tyson's alleged outburst occurred after jail officials began withholding his daily dose of Zoloft. Tyson received no medication Thursday or Friday, Kemp said.

The jail psychiatrist won't give medication to inmates unless they consult with him, said Kemp, who added that Tyson doesn't want to see the doctor because he has been under the care of a private psychiatrist. The judge recommended Tyson remain on the medication when he sentenced Tyson, Kemp said.

Tyson is a patient of Dr. Richard Goldberg, chairman of the psychiatry department at Georgetown University Medical Center, who saw him on Saturday.

Tyson also is on probation in Indiana for raping a beauty pageant contestant in an Indianapolis hotel room in 1991. He was released from prison in March 1995 after serving three years. Indiana officials are considering whether to revoke his probation based on his legal problems in Maryland.

Pierce off to a great start for Celtics

All is not happy in Pitino Land. The Celtics have sputtered to a disappointing 3-5 start to the abbreviated season. They are a mere sixth place in the Atlantic Division. They've just returned home from less-than-spectacular 2-4 road trip, and they've lost three in a row.

So, why is the NBA buzzing about the Boston Celtics?

It's not the Celts' record that has people talking. However, emerging from a collection of mediocre and sub-par performances is a star in the making — Paul Pierce. The rookie forward out of Kansas has heads turning and eyebrows raising as he remains one of the few gleaming rays of hope in an otherwise dreary beginning.

An All-American at Kansas who led his team in scoring his junior year, Pierce was predicted to be among the top five picks in the draft. But come Draft Day, as team after team passed him by, Pierce's jitters got the best of him, and he began to question his talent and abilities.

Pierce was surprisingly still available when it came time for the C's to choose with the 10th pick. But Pitino was more than happy to snatch up the overlooked prize. Pierce arrived in Boston determined to use his nerve-wracking Draft Day experience as motivation to prove to the league that he is better than his draft number indicates.

Pierce has been the perfect addition to the core of young talent around which Pitino has built his team. With each game, Pierce shows more and more skill, talent and poise on the court. In a losing cause against the Washington Wizards on Sunday, Pierce racked up a team-high 24 points, a game- high 12 rebounds, and three steals. Pierce averages 20 points per game and leads the NBA with 2.75 steals per game.

Pierce is not the average all-talk no-action rookie. When he claims to thrive in clutch situations, he means it.

Jen Cormier

Case in point — Pierce came up big in the triple overtime thriller versus the Vancouver Grizzlies, making key offensive and defensive plays. His ability to make things happen in crunch time, combined with his strong statistics have already lunged Pierce into the national spotlight as the leading candidate for Rookie of the Year.

However, Pitino remains cautious. He points out that Pierce will benefit a great deal from the shortened season. A full season of pro hoops is equivalent to about three college basketball seasons, and many rookies often run out of steam halfway through the regular season. Pierce will not have to face this challenge, and as a result, his season-ending stats may not be an accurate reflection of his performance.

He will have to work even harder next year to avoid the dreaded Sophomore Slump.

Beyond his statistics and on-court performances, Pierce has thus far proven to be a model spokesperson for the game. He understands the tradition and history that go hand in hand with wearing the green jersey and stepping onto the parquet floor.

Pierce has spoken admirably of past Celtic greats Bill Russell, Kevin McHale and Larry Bird. He has shown that he is not the typical money-grubbing, egotistical young athlete with an attitude that seems to be in vogue in the NBA of late.

Only time will tell whether or not Pierce will be able to avoid adopting the "I'm King of the World" attitude that plagues so many young NBA players these days. Pitino has said he has spoken with Pierce many times to ensure that the down to earth rookie keeps his head on his shoulders.

Pierce has the potential to be Boston hoops' version of Nomar Garciaparra. He is a badly needed crutch for the bobbling NBA, which is still recovering from the loss of Michael Jordan and the ludicrous greed-driven lockout. Pierce embodies everything basketball can and should be — a game of passion, heart, and determination, rather than a game of salary caps, arrogance, and clothing contracts.

Bulls having troubles early on; Chicago just trying to win games

CHICAGO (AP) — The shots were falling, the United Center was rocking and, for a while at least, it looked a lot like the good old days for the Chicago Bulls.

Then reality came calling. A couple of untimely misses, a no-call and the buzzer was sounding on yet another loss for the team formerly known as the NBA champs.

"We had a few chances. More than one chance," Toni Kukoc said after Chicago rallied from 15 down Tuesday only to fall 90-88 to Milwaukee. "We're all disappointed at how we ended the game."

That Chicago was going to be bad this year was a given. With Michael Jordan retired, Scottie Pippen shipped to Houston and Dennis Rodman staging yet another drama, the Bulls went from six-time champions to an expansion team in about the time it takes to say "fire sale."

They've already put together a seven-game losing streak. They tied the franchise low in points scored in an embarrassing 79-63 loss at New York on Sunday — their one game on NBC this season. They're 2-9 for the first time since 1979-'77, way back when Jordan was a skinny teenager with hair.

Only Charlotte (1-7) and the L.A. Clippers (0-8) have worse records.

"Sometimes it is kind of hard to deal with," said Dickey Simpkins, one of just five players left from last year's playoff roster. "To lose as many games as we have in a row is tough considering last year. But we still keep in mind it's going to take us time to get there."

Chicago has its poor shooting to thank for many of its problems. The Bulls are shooting 38 percent from the field; worst in the NBA. Their scoring average of 79 points is also a league low.

The Bulls are sticking with their famed triangle offense, but the newcomers are still having trouble grasping it. Mark Bryant, who scored a season-high 16 points against Atlanta on Monday and matched it Tuesday against Milwaukee, said he'd been thinking too much and trying too hard in earlier games.

"They have to think early on when they're learning and sometimes you don't play as instinctively when you're going through that," coach Tim Floyd said. "Every day they make progress."

The toughest part may be Chicago's woes at home. The United Center used to be the toughest place in the NBA to play, with the Bulls never losing more than two games in a row at home before this season. Even when Jordan was off playing baseball, the Bulls never let anyone make themselves at home in their house.

But Chicago has now lost five straight at the UC — one more home loss than the 1995-96 and 1996-97 Bulls had combined. The Clippers are the only other team still looking for a victory at home.

"We're frustrated," Brent Barry said. "We're real hungry. We just want to win one at home. We've got another one Thursday, so we're going to come out real hungry again."

For as bad as the Bulls have been, though, they've also shown flashes of respectability. No, they're not going to be a playoff team anytime soon and Chicago is going to have to find another excuse to party in Grant Park.

But they've managed to hang in there. They gave Utah more of a game than anyone expected in the season opening rematch of the NBA Finals before finally falling 104-96. They lost to Washington by one basket. They beat Atlanta on Monday night, though the Hawks were playing without Steve Smith.

and we use each other a lot. [But] I know I could never have made it without them," Mullen said. "The swim team has been my second family away from home."

Mullen also felt at home in the pool. She owns the eighth fastest time in the 200y free in UMass history and the 10th fastest time in the 200 IM. She was also a member of the 1997-98 record-breaking 800y free relay squad.

But Mullen isn't the only swimmer who first felt nervous about attending UMass.

SHANA STROTHERS

A true renaissance swimmer, the tri-captain also had butterflies upon entering college. She came to UMass partly because of the swimming program, and partly because of the Polymer Research Center's fine reputation and its ability to draw funding and the best professors in her major, biochemistry. What she liked best was that her days were scheduled, and she didn't have any time to fall behind.

Courtesy Media Relations
Julie Alexander.

"I had to practice so much that I didn't have time to do anything else," Strothers said.

That practice paid off as she ranks third on Massachusetts' all-time list in the 400 IM and fourth in the 200y back. She also stands fifth in the 500y free and in the 1000y free. The Sellersville, Pa. native also clocked the eighth best time in the 200y butterfly in her career.

Courtesy Media Relations
Amy Mullen.

Strothers' favorite personal moment was during her sophomore year at the A-10 finals when she got to walk out with the top eight finishers in the 400 IM.

"They were playing music and everyone was clapping," Strothers said. "Those are the moments I'll always remember."

While Mullen chose to remain close to home, another member of the team came to UMass for the opposite reason.

KIM SCHADT

A native of California, this senior diver hadn't even planned on competing in college. She had been a member of the Monte Viste high school three-time soccer state championship team and thought her competitive days were over.

But fate interfered and she was randomly placed to live with Strothers, who she still lives with. Diving coach Guy Pollino couldn't be happier about her decision, stating that she has not only been a leader for the divers, but she has also been an integral part in keeping strong bonds between the swimming and diving squads.

"Learning how to dive off the three-meter was biggest crisis of my life but it turned out to be my favorite event my senior year," Schadt said.

She ranks ninth on UMass' all-time list in the one-meter, 10th in both the 1-M (dual) and the 3-M, and eighth in the 3-M (dual). At last year's A-10's she finished 10th in the 3- M and 14th in the 1-M.

Courtesy Media Relations
Kim Schadt.

The road ahead

Last weekend's A-10 meet was the last competitive meet for all four of them. Schadt wants to return to California for medical school. Alexander looks forward to a career in television. Strothers hopes to work in the science field while Mullen, who is involved with the Elementary Teacher's Education Program, has her eyes on a career in teaching.

All the girls attribute coaches Bob Newcomb and Pollino as being more than just coaches.

Courtesy Media Relations
Shana Strothers.

"Guy is my best friend, I am better off having known him," Schadt said.

Of Newcomb, Strothers said, "I knew right off the bat that he was going to be a good friend. I can go to him with anything and he could help me."

Newcomb commends this year's senior class for its outstanding contributions.

"In and out of the pool, they have been leaders since day one," Newcomb said.

■ hockey

"You know, that Army goal was a clutch goal. Army was ready to pull it's goalie and bang he scored that goal," Mallen said. "The thing I like about Martin is based on the fact that he was starting behind everyone else with the knee injury is that if he works hard over the summer he can have three really good years for us."

Miljko's play has contributed to the recent offensive production, and has been one of the causes of the Minutemen's inspired offense over the last five games.

"He needs to play consistently tough and quick and when he learns to jump into the play with speed and hit the right spot, then his productivity will really come up," Mallen said. "Hockey East is a whole different world where you really have to fight through checks and beat guys one-on-one in tight situations, and that's the stuff he's really developing in his game; but when he masters that I think you're going to see his goal-scoring go up, his assists go up and our wins will go up because of his contributions."

Miljko's play is made all the more sweeter for the UMass coaching staff because he is now logging more ice time since the injury to the team's third leading scorer, Ray Geever (a separated shoulder).

"The key is that he is able to play a more regular shift. We lost Ray Geever and Kevin Poulin and when those guys go out, we needed to move someone up on the right side and that's where he has done a real nice job. He also did a nice job on the fourth line with a combination of players. Gradually over the second half of the season his presence on the ice has become more promiment. He's involved in the defense, offense and the hitting," Mallen said.

"It's been nice getting a little more ice time here and there. I've been able to show what I can do, because at the beginning of the year I didn't get the ice time, which I can understand, I'm a freshman and all. It takes time to get into the system. It's unfortunate for Ray, but it's been fortunate for me to get a few more minutes under my belt and playing a little more so I can get more confidence," Miljko said.

The Minutemen now sit at 10-18-2 and 6-13-2 in Hockey East, which is good enough for seventh place. Miljko is looking to continue to contribute to his and the team's ultimate goal of making the playoffs.

"Individually I just want to contribute any way I can, a big hit, a goal, an assist, whatever. For the team we are really looking to go to the playoffs and cause some trouble for those top three teams," Miljko said.

Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Someone is likely to give you the go–ahead today for a project that you've been waiting a long time to start. You know just where to begin, too!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You should be able to forge ahead today into the territory of your choice regardless of any inclement weather—inside or out. Tempers run hot.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You'll have a lot of good luck as the day opens, but even the slightest untimely decision can turn things around and present problems for you.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You must be more careful about what you say and to whom you say it. Something spoken a long time ago is likely to come back and haunt you today.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You can have what you want by day's end today, provided you ask for it in a direct and tactful manner. Steer clear of anything that resembles empty flattery.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Any attempt to get something the easy way is likely to backfire on you. Go for it all in a manner that is direct and it will be appreciated by others.

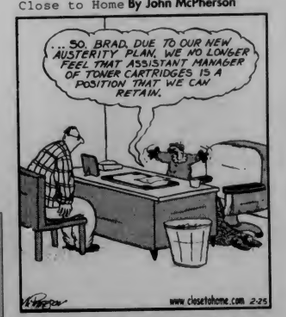
VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You mustn't let yourself become overly aggressive today. You're in no condition to take on someone who is ready and willing to "fight back."

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Today is the day to make that "fresh start" you've been talking about of late. A friend or loved one is ready to give you a friendly push.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You should be able to turn a critic into a supporter by day's end. Go about your business in a straight-forward manner for the best results.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Someone has a message for you and you're rather nervous about hearing or reading it. The truth is that it's both good and bad news.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Someone holds the key to a golden opportunity today, but you're not going to be able to take it from him or her by force. Work together!



AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Someone you know quite well is ready to back you up today, should you need any kind of moral support. Don't ask for any direct intervention!

Kane makes picks for All–America basketball team

I'm glad I don't have a vote for this year's All–America team. Actually that's not true. I'm in this business because I want to be a sportswriter, and I want to have a say in who is honored as the best in the land.

But not yet. For now I have to imagine what it would be like to have a vote. This year, though, I would be in a bit of a bind.

That's because depending on who

you've been paying attention to, how much weight you put on team performance against individual statistics, and whether or not you can honor two guys from the same team, lists of potential picks get shuffled more than a deck of cards at a Vegas blackjack table.

What makes this year's selection process even more difficult is that there are no clear–cut, outstanding candidates for Player of the Year. Granted, you can make arguments for several players — Elton Brand, Mateen Cleaves, Andre Miller among them — but there are pros and cons for each choice.

Let's get to the nitty–gritty. Here's the scoop on who should get tabbed for the top team.

• Evan Eschmeyer, center, Northwestern: Eschmeyer has held the honor of being the nation's only 20–10 guy. After a sub–par scoring performance this week, Eschmeyer's averages as of Tuesday were 19.3 points per game and 10.5 rebounds per game.

No other center has dominated the game the way Eschmeyer has this season. The Wildcats' 14–11 record (6–9 in the Big Ten) isn't anything mind–blowing, but it's better than they have performed in recent memory. And in the best conference, which features several potential All–America picks (including Cleaves), Eschmeyer is heads and shoulders above them all.

• Elton Brand, forward, Duke: The Blue Devils not only have the luxury of six scorers who are averaging 9.5 ppg or better, they have a definite Player of the Year candidate in power forward Brand, who was posting 17.6 points and 9.6 rebounds per game going into last night's contest against DePaul.

Brand's ability would put him at the top of most NBA draft lists if he decides to leave school early; although he would be the first player in coach Mike Krzyzewski's tenure to do so.

• Wally Szczerbiak, forward, Miami (Ohio): Okay, no little Shaq of the MAC references. Simply put, Szczerbiak has helped propel the Mid–American Conference out of obscurity and into the national hoop conscience.

The forward averages 24.0 ppg and 8.6 rpg for the Redhawks, who have a 19–6 record and an NCAA berth looming in the future.

• Andre Miller, guard, Utah: Imagine that, a guy from Compton calling Salt Lake City his collegiate home. And Utes fans couldn't be happier.

Miller, a tough, versatile point guard averaging 16.0 ppg, 5.9 rpg and 5.8 assists a game, has bolstered Utah to a 22–4 record after a 5–4 start.

• Jason Terry, guard, Arizona: Lone Mike Bibby and Miles Simon and you're dead in the backcourt, right? Guess again. The Wildcat guard has been the best player in the Pac–10, hands down, at 22.4 points and 5.6 assists a contest.

Think somebody's missing? Of course you do. And you're entitled to your opinion, that's what made America famous. So what about:

• Mateen Cleaves, guard, Michigan State: Let's talk stats. Cleaves isn't even the top scorer on his own team, let alone in the Big Ten. At 12.1 ppg and 7.0 assists per game, he's certainly a good player. But everything Cleaves can do, Miller can do better.

• Richard Hamilton, forward, Connecticut: Once a potential Player of the Year pick, Hamilton has fallen off because he was injured and he's not good enough.

• Quentin Richardson, forward, DePaul: This kid could be the Rookie of the Year, with a challenge to Eschmeyer's 20–10 man status.

• Chris Mihm, center, Texas: Over 13 points and 10 boards a game makes Mihm a second–team pick.

• Michael Redd, guard, Ohio State: Surprise team boasts talented guard who dropped in 19 points a game.

• Todd McCulloch, center, Washington: The seven– footer has also challenged for 20–10 status with 18.8 ppg.

• Jamel Thomas, forward, Providence: Top Big East scorer gets consideration ahead of Hamilton.

• Trajan Langdon, guard, Duke; Duke's second best player gets knocked from the first team because Brand is there.

UM seniors come to end of the road

Aquatics quartet leave their mark on program

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

This year's four senior members of the Massachusetts women's swimming and diving team, Julie Alexander, Amy Mullen, Kim Schadt and Shana Strothers, began their freshman years no different from any other college student.

"When I first came here [UMass] I was nervous about not having any friends," Strothers said. "But through the team I have made friends who I have things in common with."

"Coming in and having 25 best friends is something normal college kids don't have," Alexander said.

That seems to be the common thread for all four women, as they reflect on the benefits of being a part of the UMass swimming and diving team.

JULIE ALEXANDER

In high school at Archmere Academy, Alexander was a four–year state champ and a Congressional Scholar Athlete her senior year. She was looking for a developed swimming program at an intensity level she could compete at.

"I made my decision [to come to UMass] at the last minute," Alexander said. "I found myself fitting exactly into the program."

And fit in she did. In last year's Atlantic 10 Championship, she placed seventh in the 200–yard breast and 11th in the 100y breast. The co–captain from Boothwyn, Pa. posts the third–best time in UMass history in the 100y breast and in the 200y breast. Alexander also rounds out the top 10 in the 500y free for UMass.

One of her favorite moments of UMass swimming was on Nov. 14 of this season, when the Minutewomen defeated Boston University, 155–145.

"It came down to the last relay," Alexander said. "We really came together as a team. BU couldn't get over how excited we were to compete against them."

Her other favorite moment happened just this past weekend at the Bell Atlantic A–10 Championships in Buffalo, N.Y. It was the last race of her career and she was swimming in the 200y breast in the lane next to her co– captain and roommate, Mullen.

"After we hit the wall, we just turned to each other and gave [each other] the biggest hug. I just thought that was so neat [to be able to start and finish with her]," Alexander said.

AMY MULLEN

For Mullen, her reasons had more to do with proximity and sensibility. Her older sister, Barbara, had played water polo and swam at UMass and she wanted to be close to her Needham roots.

A member of the Boston Globe All–Scholastic Swim Team her senior year, Mullen felt that UMass held a wide variety of majors though at first she was intimidated by its size. Despite the sport's reputation as an individual activity, the tri–captain soon found solace with her teammates.

"Swimming is really individual

Many possible deals as the trade dead line is close

About a year ago, Dominik Hasek and the Czech Republic olympic hockey team were basking in the afterglow of winning the gold medal at the Olympics in Nagano, Japan. After stunning Patrick Roy, Eric Lindros and Team Canada in an exciting semi–final shootout, Hasek carried his team past Russia for the gold and himself into the spotlight as the world's best goaltender.

Now, a year later, both Roy and Hasek are both sidelined with nagging groin injuries as their respective teams go into the stretch run. So far, Hasek's absence hasn't hurt the Sabres to the extent one might expect. Buffalo is 2–0–1 in the three games the Dominator has missed, as backup Dwayne Roloson has filled in nicely.

Colorado, however, seemed to miss St. Patrick in his first game out on Tuesday. The Avs escaped with a 4–4 tie against the suddenly lowly Canucks. Colorado backup and former Bruin Craig Billington looked shaky in net.

What remains to be seen out of these two similar situations, with the trade deadline approaching, is whether or not Colorado or Buffalo need to make some deals for either a better backup or some solid defensemen as insurance for the playoffs.

If either of these star goalies is out longer than expected or reinjures themselves in the playoffs, the ramifications could be huge for both teams.

• Speaking of that looming trade deadline, just as things seem to have died down on the rumor mill, murmurs of blockbuster deals are becoming louder and louder.

One of the most intriguing names being thrown around is Mark Messier. Unfortunately, the changeover in players and coaches has not worked. Marc Crawford replaced Mike Keenan behind the bench, Pavel Bure was shipped out in a bucketful of players and draft picks, and there were still no results for Vancouver.

Now, as a result of this downward spiral, it seems as if they could be willing to auction off Messier.

Many believe Dallas could be the team willing to bid the highest as it has let it be known that it is willing to do whatever it takes to bring home the Cup.

The Stars recently seemed to be the front–runners for Calgary's Theo Fleury but with the Flames' recent surge back into the playoff picture, Dallas and all other interested parties have been put on a waiting list.

My take on the whole "Mess" in Vancouver — Messier, given he comes back from injury by March 23 (the trading deadline), will go to Toronto.

Toronto might make sense as a final destination for Messier. The Leafs, who stand in sixth place in the Eastern Conference could use some more depth and experience for the playoffs.

What really makes sense here is Messier's status as a Canadian hockey icon. With the Leafs just settling into their new digs at the Molson Centre, why not bring a living legend and Canadian hero in for one last run at Lord Stanley's Cup.

Toronto has an abundance of youth both on its roster and in the minors, that could serve as bait to lure Vancouver into a deal. Vancouver is going nowhere fast and should start building for the future.

The trade winds have also picked up in the Windy City, where first–year coach Dirk Graham has got the ax after leading the Blackhawks to the worst record in 42 years.

General Manager Bob Pulford has declared everyone except Tony Amonte and goalie Jocelyn Thibeault to be on the trading block. Look for Alexi Zhamnov to be dealt, possibly to New Jersey, which could use some offensive punch.

Doug Gilmour is also up for grabs but no one wants his giant contract. Rumors of Chris Chelios being dealt continue to swirl despite Chelios vehemently denying them.

• Sorry Bruins fans, despite all the trade chaos surrounding the NHL, the Bruins seem to be in no hurry to make a deal and give themselves a legitimate shot at making it past the second round of the playoffs.

Owner Jeremy Jacobs and G.M. Harry Sinden have repeatedly let their disapproval of today's high salaries be known, so don't even to begin to think that the Bruins might dip their feet into the hot trade waters. Unfortunately for the Bruins players and their fans, the only dipping the Bruins might do will be in the standings.

What is really so unfortunate about Sinden and Jacobs' stance against the NHL's current market and their inactivity on the trade front, is that one of the greatest players ever might never

The recent play of Miljko is clutch for Minutemen

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

In a season of firsts for Massachusetts hockey, freshman Martin Miljko added his own pair of firsts in the last couple of games, his first collegiate goals, en route to helping UMass get closer to solidify a Hockey East playoff berth.

Martin Miljko.

The 5'11" forward from Etobicoke, Ontario has been a big addition to the UMass lineup this season. After sitting out seven of the first eight games with a knee injury, it's taken Miljko more time to develop into the point producer that coach Joe Mallen expected him to be early in the season. But the forward is firing on all cylinders at the best time of the season — the stretch run. Now playing consistently and logging more ice time, Miljko is beginning to get his timing against the Hockey East talent.

"I remember my first game against UNH [New Hampshire] my head was spinning. I didn't know what was going on. It was a tough adjustment. Most people tell you it takes till Christmas to get used to it [Hockey East play], but I missed seven of the first eight games and I came in with an attitude where I'm just going to go out and do my best, and not be afraid to make a mistake," Miljko said.

Great things were expected from the freshman as a direct result of his play in the juniors, when he played in Ontario for Brampton Capitals of the Provincial Junior Hockey League. While a Capital, Miljko served as the captain and was named MVP of the team. He was the second leading scorer in the league with 62 goals, 105 points overall. Miljko was also an All–Star selection in the OPJHL.

"He's got a really hard shot and he can really pull the trigger in tight. That's allowed him to score a lot over the years. When the other things start coming, he can be a real complete player," Mallen said.

Although Miljko has only tallied two goals and nine assists this season, he has scored four of the most important, most recently by scoring both of his goals and two of his assists in the last five games, of which the Minutemen have won four.

"With a lot of freshman you have high expectations, but with him he started the year with a knee injury, so he was behind a lot of guys in terms of his conditioning, so it's taken him longer to get up to game speed and prove that he can play on regular basis. Since then he has stepped up big. Last week he moved up on the depth chart and he responded with a couple of goals," Mallen said.

The Ontario native collected his first collegiate goal against Northeastern, in a must–win game at the William D. Mullins Center, a 6–3 win for the Minutemen. Miljko was also involved on two of the other goals with assists. He then followed up that performance with a huge goal in a 2–0 win over non–conference Army. His goal helped seal the win and momentum for their first Hockey East road win against UMass–Lowell the very next night.

"That first goal against Northeastern really took a load off my shoulders... They just haven't been going in, but things are starting to work well with the guys I've been playing with," Miljko said. "It's one of those things, you're in a drought and you score your first and who knows. That first goal gave me a lot of confidence."

Rayside's return helps boost Minutewomen hoops

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

With the looming possibility of having to face the top three conference teams in the Atlantic 10 tournament, the Massachusetts women's basketball team is in dire need of an x–factor.

Senior center Yolanda Rayside, coming off an injury could be that missing link to provide a spark for the Minutewomen in Philadelphia this weekend.

Rayside has averaged 6.4 points and 6.9 rebounds per game, but has played only briefly in the last two contests after missing six due to a separated shoulder.

After Rayside sustained the injury at practice on Jan. 27, Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien expected to be without the services of the 6–foot–3 center for the remainder of the season.

Due to a rigorous training and rehab program, Rayside was able to make a widely–anticipated return to the lineup for Senior Night, a 59–39 victory over St. Bonaventure.

"I was just so happy that my teammates made it possible for me to play on Senior Night," Rayside said. "The injury was the most frustrating thing that happened to me here at UMass. I saw my whole career flash before me over the past few weeks."

While Rayside only stepped foot on the floor with two minutes remaining in the St. Bonnies game, she played a more significant role in the season finale, a 76–51 thumping of Fordham.

O'Brien had enough confidence in Rayside to send her into battle for three separate stints, and she responded with two points, one rebound, and one block in nine minutes of action.

"Having Yolanda back is so important to us heading into the tournament," O'Brien said. "I won't hesitate to play her this weekend, because just having her out there gives this team a shot in the arm."

While Nekole Smith has established herself as the most potent offensive threat amongst the UMass post players, Rayside, when healthy is still the most physical player on the boards and on defense.

"We really missed what Yolanda brings to this team while she was out," O'Brien said. "The rebounding and the adrenaline she brings onto the court will really help us get going when she is in the game."

Judging by her career accomplishments at UMass, Rayside could likely live up to O'Brien's expecta-

Spring concert will be held at Mullins Center, Bosstones a possibility

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association has confirmed that the Spring Concert will be held on May 8th in the William D. Mullins Center. No bands have been contracted yet, but there is an unconfirmed rumor that the Mighty Mighty Bosstones will be one of the four bands playing. The SGA, along with Campus Activity advisors, WMUA, and University Productions and Concerts (UPC) have decided that the Mullins Center would be the optimal place to have the concert.

Brendon Beane, a senator for commuters and a member of the Spring Concert committee said, "At first I was skeptical about the Spring Concert being in the Mullins Center, but the fact is in order to guarantee a concert it needed to be indoors. We are working hard to achieve a festival atmosphere."

The SGA prevalent issues regarding this decision include the fact that if it rains during an outdoor show it would be cancelled, and the money would go to waste. Also, for an outdoor show, over 150 volunteers would be necessary for security and tickets, as well as fencing and staging.

According to Damon Eden, UPC Production Manager, "People have signed up in the past to be volunteers after outside shows and then didn't show up. For a UPC concert not one volunteer showed up for clean up and we had to then pay workers to do it. At the Mullins Center, that's already taken care of."

Eden also mentioned the weather issue and the fact that the Mullins Center carries its own insurance so it isn't something that they need to worry about.

Avi Khanna, Secretary of University Policy said that "Spring Concert '99 will go far beyond an ordinary concert, it will be a day jam–packed with festivities including games, prizes, food and give–aways."

Tickets will be free to students and everyone will be allowed to come and go as they please. According to Eden, no one is expecting the lack of seating in the Mullins Center to be a problem because they are not expecting all of the University of Massachusetts students to show up and be there at the same time.

Eden said that the Mullins Center allows for things that weren't possible before, like bands playing while main acts are setting up. The SGA is currently looking for student talent that is available for and between main acts. For Further information contact Lisa Cook or Avi Khanna at the SGA office in the Student Union.

UM professor Lewis discusses Teletubbies

Cartoon may impact gender roles

By Matthew Call
Collegian Correspondent

Last month, televangelist Rev. Jerry Falwell became the Ken Starr of children's television when he published an article proclaiming that a member of the Teletubbies was gay.

The February issue of the National Liberty Journal, a magazine edited by Falwell, contained a warning to parents that Tinky Winky, one of the four Teletubbies, had significant characteristics that call into question his sexual preference.

The so–called evidence that the National Liberty Journal cites in outing the fictional character includes the fact that the soft–spoken Tinky Winky is purple, the same color associated with gay pride. The inverted triangle on top of his head is also a gay pride symbol.

Reading even further into the show, the magazine referred to a red purse that he carries around, which the show's creators insist is a magic bag.

Falwell was widley criticized for the comments, and University of Massachusetts communications professor Justin Lewis believes that the idea of a character breaking down gender roles is exactly what children's television needs.

"It seemed to me that they were playing around with gender roles," Lewis said. "It took me a while to get which were the male characters and which were the female characters because it's not that clear."

Lewis says that TV geared toward children is highly commercialized and the characters are confined by their gender. A show like Sesame Street, he explains, has strict guidelines for men and women.

"It's ridiculous in many ways," Lewis said. "They're clearly trying to code female gender whereas here on the Teletubbies, they're playing with that."

This isn't the first time Tinky Winky and his three buddies have caused a controversy. In the show's first year, the actor who played Tinky was fired for dancing in public wearing nothing but a balloon.

Teens in London have also been known to hold parties that involve watching Teletubbies under the influence of controlled substances.

They were trying to present girl images that were more active and boy images that were more decorative," Lewis says of the Teletubbies.

The show also deviates from the violence that fills a majority of programming for young people."

"There are also an awful lot of violent images on kid's television. If Tinky Winky had beaten up a few people, then Jerry Falwell would've thought that Tinky Winky was okay. Like a nice Ninja Turtle."

New Hadley Wal-Mart not alone

Nationwide chain of department stores plans to branch to Noho

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Wal–Mart, with one store opening next fall in Hadley, is heading up the road and landing a second store in Northampton.

After the Caldor's retail chain claimed bankruptcy this year, Wal–Mart bought 12 Caldor locations in the Northeast for $72,935,260.

The Northampton Wal–Mart will be located in Caldor's current location in the North King Street shopping plaza, according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

The purchase was approved Feb. 22 In US Bankruptcy Court and included stores in Framingham, Chelmsford, Brockton and others in Connecticut and New York.

Wal–Mart officials could not confirm the size of the location or length of the lease for the Northampton store. But according to the Gazette, Caldor's leases 90,000 square feet of commercial space in the North King Street shopping plaza.

Melissa Brown, a spokesperson for Wal–Mart, did say it was not unusual to have two Wal–Mart stores in close proximity in order to serve different communities better.

Brown said the Caldor stores are allowed to stay dark until March 2000, after which Wal–Mart's can be expected to move in.

The Hadley Wal–Mart will be going into the Mountain Farms Mall in time for holiday shopping this year. Demolition started the first week in February on the eastern third of the area where Wal–Mart will be.

Demolition stopped temporarily for asbestos removal, but Robert Frazier, vice–president of development for W.S. Development, which owns the Mountain Farms Mall said demolition would resume when the removal is complete.

The Hadley Wal–Mart, Frazier said, has a 20–year lease that can be renewed indefinitely. The Hadley store was met with some opposition when trying to gain entrance into the town.

They're kind of predatory in their pricing. They'll target a specific area like garden stores. They [lower prices] until all of them are out of business then they can jack up prices," said Pam Westgate, an organizer of the citizen's group Hadley First in an Feb. 18 Massachusetts Daily Collegian article.

Brown said she could not speculate as to whether or not their would be opposition to the Northampton store.

Wal–Mart stores Inc., operates more than 2,400 stores and 450 Sam's Clubs in the US.

Professor presents series: Truth and Consequences

Rebecca Sablo
Collegian Staff

Speaking extensively on her two latest projects, Professor of Geography Julie Graham stressed a need to create alternative discourse through social research.

On Wednesday, Graham presented the second lecture in the "Truth and Consequences" series sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Women's Studies Department.

Graham's current project focuses specifically on the different, rather than the dominant, in society. Graham applies the "queer theory" of disrupting what is normal or dominant to the economies of the "Happy Valley" — Amherst, Northampton, Springfield, and Holyoke.

The research "questions the naturalization of capitalist dominance" and strives to achieve an alternative where capitalism is not the only economically identifiable system.

"The goal is to generate a discourse of economic differences to foster a new economic oppurtunity," she said. With a "new language of economy" and the identification of "invisible" activites, said Graham, society will become more receptive to alternatives and realize that capitalism is not the only system in place today.

The research itself consists of a series of phases in which dominant persons in the economy are interviewed, as well as those who contribute to the invisible activities of the economy.

A case study based on the interviews is examined and all participants are brought together to discuss the results in a forum.

Tara Maybury, a junior geography major, was especially impressed by the presentation.

"I think it's interesting how she breaks down the binary system of developed and undeveloped. She looks at the differentiation within each economic system," Maybury said.

Yvonne Shanahan from the Center for International Education at UMass made note of the attention that Graham gave to her audience.

"Graham was an open and flexible speaker. She really listens to the questions and you can physically see her formulating the answers. There was nothing defensive or automatic about her answers," Shanahan said.

Shock jock "Greaseman" loses job

By Anne Gearon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A shock jock who made light of a grisly racial killing lost his job yesterday, a relatively rare case of radio shock deemed simply too shocking.

Washington's Doug "Greaseman" Tracht was suspended by station WARW Wednesday after he played a portion of a song by Grammy award–winning singer Lauryn Hill and remarked, "No wonder people drag them behind trucks."

The comment linked Hill, who is black, to the dragging death in Texas of a black man, James Byrd Jr. A white supremacist was sentenced to death Thursday in Byrd's killing.

A statement from the station announcing Tracht's firing yesterday apologized to listeners who were offended.

"While we will always strongly support the right of our on–air artists to express a wide range of opinions, even those that are unpopular or offensive to some, WARW cannot be associated with the trivialization of an unspeakable act of violence," the statement read.

Tracht deserved to be fired for a remark that "was stupendously stupid and double–stupendously evil," said Michael Harrison, editor of Talkers Magazine, an industry monthly.

But if history is a guide, Tracht may be back on the air somewhere before too long.

Although Harrison estimates a shock jock gets the boot about once a year somewhere in the country, the genre and its practitioners endure.

Previously, the best–known recent example of a shock jock firing was Bob Grant's dismissal from WABC in 1996 after saying he was "a pessimist" for believing that Commerce Secretary Ron Brown had survived a plane crash. Brown, who was black, died in the crash that year.

Grant, who in the past had referred to blacks as "savages," is back on the air at a rival New York station.

Other radio hosts regularly get in hot water with listeners, including the widely syndicated Howard Stern and Don Imus. Stations choose the format knowing the hosts will probably offend people, but will also attract listeners that matter to advertisers — notably young men.

"This goes with the territory," said Robert Lichter, president of the Center for Media and Public Affairs, a nonpartisan study group in Washington.

"This type of broadcast depends on being shocking and disgusting and occasionally will hit a nerve at the wrong time and somebody will get suspended or fired," Lichter said.

"And then things will go back like they were."

Short of an individual broadcaster's decision to suspend or fire a host, there is little punishment for radio raunchiness. The Federal Communications Commission regulates indecency to a point, but free speech rights generally protect tastelessness.

Author Andre Dubus dead at the age of 62

HAVERHILL (AP)— Andre Dubus, an acclaimed writer whose works centered on discontented New Englanders and his own struggle after a crippling accident, has died. He was 62.

The author of the books "Dancing After Hours" and "Meditations From a Movable Chair" was heralded by many as one of the finest short–story writers of his generation. He was discovered unconscious Wednesday evening in his Haverhill home and later pronounced dead at Hale Hospital.

The cause of death was not immediately available.

In a telephone interview, Tobias Wolff said that Dubus' death was a personal loss as much as a literary one.

"He was one of my best friends," said Wolff, author of "This Boy's Life" and the short–story collection "The Barracks Thief." "I loved him," Wolff said as his voice cracked. "He was a writer of absolute integrity and humanity."

Born in Lake Charles, La., Dubus graduated from McNeese State College and served in the U.S. Marine Corps until 1964.

Ballinger confesses to church burnings

By JR Ross
Associated Press

MUNCIE, Ind. — As many as 50 church fires in the Midwest and South over the past five years may have been solved all at once with the arrest of a man fascinated with the satanic.

Paramedics became suspicious of Jay Scott Ballinger, 36, because he waited two days before seeking treatment for severe burns he claimed to have suffered in a bonfire.

A Ball State University police officer, acting on a hunch, questioned him. Finally, last weekend, Ballinger admitted to federal authorities that he burned 30 to 50 churches in 11 states between 1994 and 1998.

So far, agents have connected Ballinger to close to 20 arsons, and he has been charged in seven of them, all involving rural churches in Indiana.

Agents said they aren't certain of a motive, but Ballinger's interest in the occult is clear. Police said a few years ago, he persuaded 50 teen-agers to sign contracts in blood pledging their souls to the devil.

Ballinger's stripper girlfriend and another man have admitted taking part in burning an Indiana church where they painted an upside-down cross on the steps as part of a satanic ritual. All three suspects are white. Some of the dozens of churches were predominantly white, and others were black. Pat Donovan, an agent of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, said he is unsure whether any of the fires were under investigation by the government task force established in 1996 after a series of fires at black churches in the South.

In an affidavit this week, Ballinger said he burned churches in Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia, Indiana, Ohio, Alabama and four other states that authorities refused to identify. Some of the churches were destroyed; others sustained less than $5,000 in damage. A firefighter was killed in one blaze in which Ballinger has been implicated.

Ballinger and his two alleged accomplices, Angela Wood, 24, of Atlanta, and Donald A. Puckett, 37, of Lebanon, Ind., first came to authorities' attention in 1997. A suspect in an unrelated case implicated them in a 1994 church fire in Lebanon, but there was not enough evidence to arrest them, Donovan said. The three admitted the crime this month, he said.

Poll says people want Clinton's policies to stay

By Will Lester
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Americans' optimism about their nation is higher than it has been in more than three decades, even though their trust in government is low, says a new poll.

More than half of the public said they would like to see the next president continue the policies and programs of the Clinton administration. But the poll suggested that an overwhelming majority want a president with different personal traits.

It remains to be seen if that is a perfect situation for Vice President Al Gore.

Gore is the current front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2000. But enthusiasm for Gore is lagging behind two leading Republicans — Texas Gov. George W. Bush and Elizabeth Dole — who are considering running for the presidency, said a poll released yesterday by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

"There are good times that aren't going away," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center. According to the poll, 28 percent of the public in the new poll was very optimistic about the current state of the country, almost as high as in 1964. This was an increase over the 20 percent who felt that way last year.

"People are more positive about the country and therefore, there is a desire for continuity," Kohut said.

"But there is also a desire for change," he said, noting the large majority who want different personal qualities in the next president.

A modest majority of adults, 54 percent, would like to see the next president offer policies and programs similar to those offered by the Clinton administration. But four out of five want someone with different personal qualities from those of President Clinton, who survived an impeachment effort this winter prompted by the Monica Lewinsky scandal.

"You would think Al Gore would fill that bill better than he does in terms of public reaction," Kohut said. "He obviously has some work to do."

The vice president's internal polls show the public likes what he's doing, said Bob Squier, a Gore campaign consultant.

"They are open to the Gore message," he said. "How do you keep a good thing going?"

Unforeseen Nor'easter hammers New England

By Karen Russo
Associated Press

BOSTON — A storm that defied prediction roared in off the Atlantic yesterday, whiting out Cape Cod, causing dozens of minor automobile collisions and closing hundreds of schools and businesses in eastern Massachusetts.

In coastal regions, people hunkered down in their homes from Salisbury to Sandwich. Government and other employees were sent home early, avoiding a slow-going evening commute.

"I keep looking at it on my deck and I'm horrified," said Mary Sunsone, 66, of East Dennis. "It reminded me of the Blizzard of '78. Even though I know that it's not as bad, it does keep piling up."

Though the accumulation on parts of Cape Cod and the islands rivaled the 1978 numbers, a spokesman for the National Weather Service said this storm was not nearly as severe because winds weren't as bad. And the storm didn't bring widespread coastal flooding like in 1978.

But the snow amounts were much greater than some of the region had seen so far this winter. Providence, R.I., for example, had a total of 13.5 inches of snow before this week, but was buried under 10 new inches Thursday.

About 8,000 Commonwealth Electric customers in Harwich lost power around 9 p.m., as did at least 6,000 more scattered through Martha's Vineyard, Bourne, Barnstable, and Sandwich. With the exception of Martha's Vineyard, none were expected to be without electricity overnight, said utility spokesman John Ball.

People in Chappaquiddick, however, were having a tougher time. "Everytime they get the line fixed, it ices up and goes down, but there are only about 50 people out there," Ball said. The Red Cross set up emergency shelters in Barnstable, Sandwich and Hyannis because scattered power outages on the Cape created problems for elderly people, especially those who use oxygen machines.

As of late evening, however, few people were taking advantage of the shelters, said John Tommaney, a spokesman for the Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency.

Plows couldn't keep up with the snow on the Cape and South Shore as the Nor'easter dumped 16 inches on West Dennis, 14 inches on Nantucket and 9 inches in Plymouth by 5:30 p.m.

During the evening commute, Route 6 eastbound was shut down and Exit 2 in Sandwich was closed because it was impassable.

"We are encouraging people to stay off of the road," said state police Lt. Harry Craig, in South Yarmouth. "It is unbelievable that they are out there."

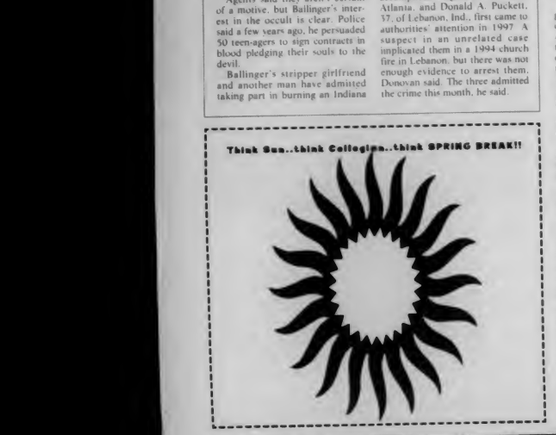
As many as 35,000 people who planned to fly in or out of Logan International Airport were stuck as more than half of the regularly scheduled flights were canceled.

But since word of delays and cancellations got out early, few people were stranded at the airport, said airport spokesman Phil Orlandella.

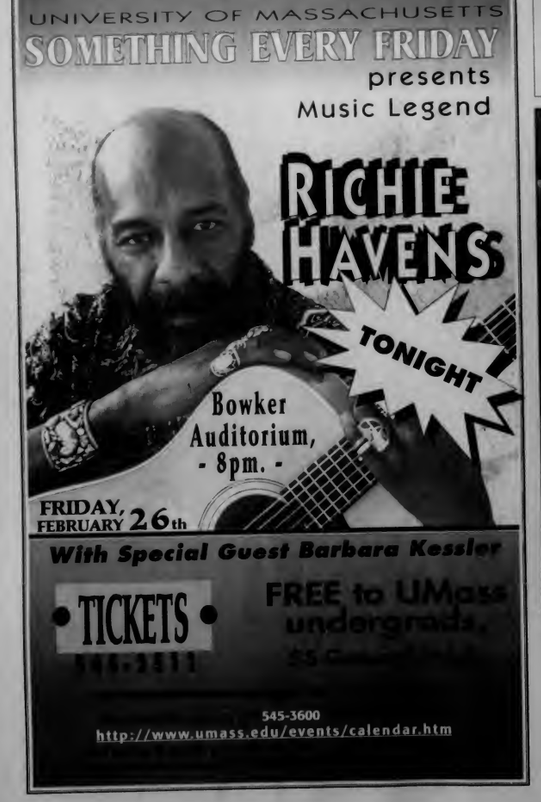
The storm burst inland from the Atlantic before dawn and weather forecasters said it might not end until Friday around noon. A local state of emergency was declared on Martha's Vineyard at 2 p.m., putting all emergency response personnel on alert. Ferry service was canceled to both the Vineyard and Nantucket due to high winds and low visibility.

As the storm bore down, people rushed to the local store to stock up on batteries, lamp oil, bread and canned food.

"The plow guys are stopping for coffee, donuts, Twinkies, because most of them have been working since last night," said Gary Durant, owner of the Millbury Market in Duxbury.



"People are doubling up because they know they'll be home with the kids tomorrow," he said.



The National Weather Service said up to 20 inches could get dumped on Massachusetts — with the heaviest accumulations along Cape Cod and the Islands and the South Shore.

Avalanche spares a young boy as death toll hits new heights

By Alexander G. Higgins
Associated Press

LANDECK, Austria — The smile of a resuscitated 4-year-old boy — given up for dead when rescuers found him under a massive snowslide — brought hope and joy to this snow-deluged valley yesterday, even as the death toll from two avalanches rose to 53. In the western Austrian village of Galtuer, where at least 28 people were killed, scores of rescuers used long metal probes to search for at least three people still believed buried beneath tons of snow.

Videotapes brought back by rescue teams showed cars crushed by walls of snow or hurled like toys by the force of Tuesday's avalanche. The top floor of one house was missing, as if sliced off by a giant razor blade.

Roads into the mountainous area remained blocked yesterday, but maintenance crews worked steadily, hoping to clear them by this afternoon.

Dozens of helicopters ferried food and supplies into the stricken area, and brought out tourists. Choppers from the German army and police, Switzerland and U.S. army bases in Germany reinforced pilots from the Austrian army.

The U.S. Blackhawks and other helicopters shuttling survivors out to Landeck landed in a swirl of snow on a blocked-off autobahn outside of town. A string of buses there took vacationers to an army camp where psychological counseling was available. From there, the travelers boarded trains for the final leg of the journey home. The 4-year-old Austrian boy, whose name was not released, was dubbed "the miracle of Valzur" for surviving 100 minutes under the snow in the second of two deadly avalanches that killed dozens in western Austria.

When rescuers found him late Wednesday, he was frozen and had no circulation. He was rushed to nearby Galtuer, where doctors saved his life by slowly "warming him up" before sending him to a hospital in the town of Zams.

"When he arrived at the hospital he had a pacifier in his mouth, and he even smiled a little," Dr. Alois Schranz told the Austria Press Agency.

"The boy is well. He eats normally, he talks and plays," pediatrician Irene Walch told The Associated Press. She said he would remain under observation.

UM first in Regional Tournament

The 5 a.m. practices have paid off. The travelling, strenuous workouts and numerous fundraisers have proved their ground also, as the Massachusetts women's ice hockey team skated away with their biggest victory of the season and a handsome trophy to put on the mantle. The woman took first place this past weekend in a string of games at the Regional Club Tournament at Holy Cross in Worcester, carrying their record to 13-4.

UMass stood their ground and defeated all the teams in their own western division, beating Penn State 2-1, Clarkson 5-1 and Syracuse 9-0. The Minutewomen then accelerated on to the final level of the tournament for the championship game Sunday evening where they struck gold and the win, defeating the champion of the eastern division — MIT, 2-0.

The Minutewomen hope to clasp victory again, as they face the University of Connecticut in a home game on Saturday at 1 p.m. in the Mullins Center practice rink. However, the women's real challenge of the weekend comes on Sunday when they travel to Boston to skate against Boston University. BU has presented a challenge for the Minutewomen in the past. In the last face off against BU the women lagged in the third and failed to execute power plays to their advantage, as Terriers clutched the victory in the early minutes of the third period and skimmed by with the tie-breaking tally. But that was a down game for the Minutewomen and they have since bounced back, proving this in their last cluster of victories against St. Michael's, UMass-Lowell and in the club tourney.

Senate urges Clinton to sponsor resolution

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate urged the Clinton administration to sponsor a resolution condemning China for human rights abuses when the U.N. Human Rights Commission meets next month in Geneva. Sponsors of the measure said yesterday's 94-0 vote, although not legally binding, would send a powerful message to the Beijing government as well as to democracy advocates in China in advance of Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's visit next week.

"The arrested dissidents and their courageous supporters deserve our full backing in their historic struggle to bring democracy to China," said Sen. Paul Wellstone, D-Minn., a sponsor of the measure.

President Clinton ignored a similar resolution passed by Congress last year.

The administration had pushed human-rights condemnations of China at past Geneva sessions but declined to do so in 1998 because Clinton was then planning a visit to China.

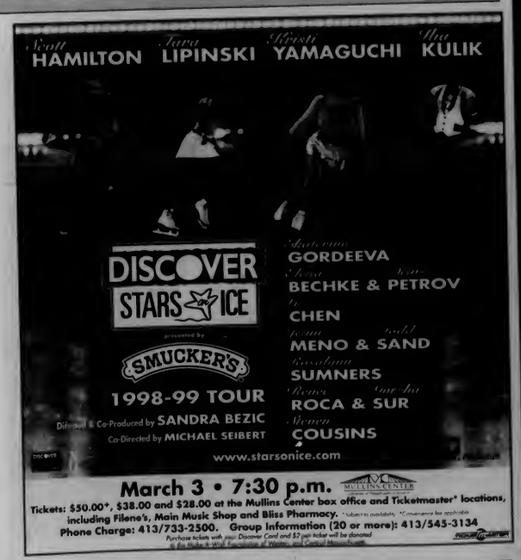
But since that trip last July, and despite Beijing's promises to exhibit more tolerance, China's communist leaders "have intensified their crackdown," said Sen. Tim Hutchinson, R-Ark. "The pattern of abuse is clear."

"It's important for our secretary of state to have that message when she goes to China," Hutchinson said.

Albright is scheduled to meet Chinese officials on Monday and Tuesday for talks on an array of concerns, including human rights.

Testifying before the House International Relations Committee, Albright said yesterday she would "bring a strong message of support for international norms of respect for human rights, and this will come as no surprise to Beijing."

"Let me stress," she said, "in our relations with China, engagement is not endorsement. We continue to have sharp differences with Beijing, but we also believe that the best way to narrow those differences and to make progress where our interests coincide is through regular contact and dialogue."



Albright told a Senate panel Wednesday that the administration hadn't yet decided whether to offer an anti-China resolution at the upcoming Geneva meeting.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., told the Senate: "There continue to be terrible human rights violations in China." Lott said he deliberately scheduled the measure second on the Senate calendar to emphasize its importance.

The first, passed Wednesday, was a big pay raise for the military. Republican leaders are trying to demonstrate that the Clinton impeachment trial didn't undermine their agenda.

At the same time, the China resolution had great Democratic support.

The only senator who didn't vote in the unanimous roll call was Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J.

The day the music died

Some things in this world aren't just or right! Like pineapples on pizza, game show hosts and neon leeps. But with age and listening to sounds of "soft ocean waves" cassette tapes, you learn to choose your battles and relax a little. Every now and again I hear something that interrupts my mellowness, though, making me a little squirmy.

For instance, on MTV the other night I saw Bob Weir from the Greatful Dead performing at a small New York City club with Hanson. Following that, I learned that REM will be appearing on Party of Five — Claudia will kiss the box of her dreams at an REM show.

"Sexy," said Kurt Loder in his unapologetically sexy drawl. "Blondie is back. Here's a snippet of their new video featuring Coolio."

My head was spinning and suddenly I wondered why we're always reinventing the wheel. Why can't we just say, "Hey it's round, it rolls, hallelujah!" Blondie rocks and rolls minus Coolio, hallelujah, amen.

But, no — good rock 'n roll isn't enough anymore. We have to make it technical and electronic. We have to bleach its hair blond and make it kick itself in the ass. The kids want to see Hanson flipping their golden manes around, not Bob Weir talking about Haight–Ashbury in his Depends.

And that is the misery of it. Music is a business just like every other artistic enterprise. Thirteen to sixteen year-olds in this country have the most capitalistic power right now. It's easy to see how this reflects current pop-culture.

I think it's a safe bet to assume Michael Stipe isn't a big "Party of Five" fan. He probably doesn't even know Bails and Sarah are doin' it.

Julie Falkow

Yeah, I think he made the decision to perform on "Party of Five" instead of, say, "60 Minutes" not because Charlie is cuter than Mike Wallace, but because of the big buck.

I can't condemn the music industry that I support. I'm not some rock 'n roll purist. I welcome everything with open arms. It's just sad to me that we have to witness these embarrassing collaborations in silence and pity. As we dole out another $17.99 at Sam Goody, all we can do is sigh. "Ovey."

What will the future be like? My kids probably won't even know who Coolio is and they won't care if they'll just ask me to pass the freeze dried peas across the space-mobile, and turn up the laser disc. (Oh, I just realized I'm 22, and it won't be the latest age when I have kids. Hmm.)

I'll be reminiscing about how pure and sacrimonial the music of my youth was, and condemn their choices. That's the way it always is. My parents can't understand the lyrics to the music I listen to.

"What are they saying?" They're yelling! How doesn't make any sense," they say.

Well, I have one question for you? Who put the bop in the bop-she-bop-she-bop, and who the hell put the ram in the ram-a-lam-a-ding-dong?

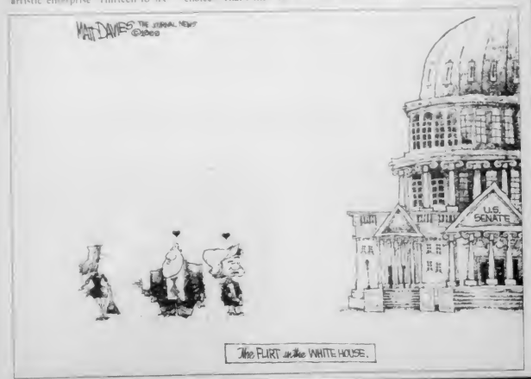
Just shut me when I start babbling about the merits of New Kids or MC Hammer to my kids.

And then I started chanting go Hammer go Hammer, go! We were all doing the running man, it was the summer of '91, and your mom's hangs almost reached the ceiling that night.

One of the members of REM said something on MTV that created a little moment of clarity for me.

He said basically, "You know, a few years ago we sat down and thought and discussed everything before we made a decision. We're just doing this because we think it will be fun.

Yeah, music is all about good times and good money. Maybe that's the real forging of themes that is difficult to grasp.



"The kids want to see Hanson flipping their golden manes around, not Bob Weir talking about Haight–Ashbury in his Depends."

"Oh, what a long strange trip it's been" says Bob Weir, his eyes moist as he watches Hanson from the wings.

All he can do is submit.

"Mmmbop," he sings with his head bowed. "Mmmmbop."

Letters to the Editor

Non–white students don't get fair shake

To the Editor:

The UMass Anti–Racism Coalition strongly condemns the elimination of Affirmative Action policies to promote the admission of non–white students into the University. As reported on February 19, UMass is no longer going to use racial preference to admit students of color.

The administration claims its elimination of race as one of the criteria to gain admission is due to the failure of Boston Latin public high school to appeal the November 18, 1998 court ruling. The Collegian reported that Boston Latin's decision "left administrators [at UMass] scrambling for solutions." Rather than a sense of concern on the part of UMass administrators, their quick action, coming only one week after Latin's decision not to appeal its case, indicates the willingness on the part of the UMass administration to jettison affirmative action, without so much as putting up at least the appearance of opposition, much less a principled fight.

If Governor Celluci, UMass President Bulger, Board of Higher Education Chair Carlin, and Chancellor Scott truly wished to fight racism and counter white supremacy by promoting the admission of non–white students into the University, then they would willingly and boldly go to court and defend the University's Affirmative Action policies. Right wing reactionaries leave no space for critical responses as they co–opt the language of justice, equal opportunity, and individual and collective rights to promote a climate that achieves the exact opposite effect.

If they took a principled stand, the University community and the vast majority of working citizens of the Commonwealth would support them. Instead, these four white "leaders" have chosen to capitulate and appease the racist sentiment spreading through the country — the racist sentiment that provokes New York cops to shoot an unarmed black man 41 times, and the one that corporate America depends upon to keep the working class in this country divided.

In his letter to all UMass students, Scott indicated that diversity may be achieved by utilizing factors other than race in admitting students into UMass. We say this is a smoke screen and the only class that will end up benefitting from this system, in lieu of "race", will be the wealthy and white bourgeoisie.

The decision last year to move forward with the elitist Commonwealth Honors College signaled the administration's pandering to elitist values, and away from the democratic values incumbent upon a public university. The Chancellor's recent about–face on housing vouchers further accelerates this war on working–class students and shows that they have little commitment to students from lower socioeconomic backgrounds.

It is a day of change for UMass and the Commonwealth. Workers everywhere: black, brown, and white must rally in unity for the principled stand in defense of Affirmative Action.

Affirmative action policies are misunderstood

To the Editor:

As coeditors and Editorial Advisory Board member of the journal of Equity and Excellence in Education, we would like to clarify the issues raised in the February 19 headline story in the Daily Collegian "UMass admissions procedures must change: Supreme Court rules against race preference." The article refers to the Boston Latin Admissions court case, and to shifts in admissions policy at this campus. We are concerned that statements about both of these issues, particularly among advocates of equal educational opportunity, may cause undue panic and despair.

First, in regard to the Boston Latin school case: this is a case about a public "test" high school admissions policy that was reversed by the federal First District Court of Appeals. In reality, the Latin School reversal should have no relevance to admissions policy at UMass, except as it is viewed in the context of a federal Supreme Court increasingly hostile to affirmative action influencing decisions made at the next lower court level. Civil rights lawyers decided not to appeal the case to the Supreme Court because it had the potential to create "bad law" of national impact.

In short, to clarify the situation in Massachusetts, the legislature has not, like California, passed a law forbidding affirmative action, nor does the recent Federal Court of Appeals decision in the Boston school case pertain directly to university admissions policy.

Second, we turn to the shift in admissions policy at our University that has received press here and in Boston. The most recent Supreme Court decision on admission policy was the Bakke case involving the University of California at Berkeley medical school in 1978. The court in that case ruled that schools could not rely primarily on race in admission, but could use race as one factor of many.

It pointed to the model of Harvard University which used a variety of factors in admissions. Of course, public and private colleges have always considered many factors like geographic diversity, alumni legacy, athletic or musical accomplishment, as well as racial, economic, or religious background. "Reverse" discrimination cases recently brought by right–wing organizations cynically ignore these realities and zero–in on what they consider racial inequity.

The University lawyers in the president's office and those who administer our admissions policies must constantly strive for fairness, access, and accountability to the Commonwealth, but we hope that such caution will never be in response to blatant bullying and cynical legal threats that destroy common ideas and goals.

Until the day that race, class, and unequal schooling do not almost always converge at the same zip code, UMass' admissions policy will only be fair when it is proactive in seeking diversity.

~Notes From The Campus Center Basement~

I always thought of Notes from the Campus Center Basement as desperate attempts by Collegian senior staff members to communicate with the outside world; to try to explain what makes our life here in this subterranean concrete chamber (with poor ventilation and no windows) different from anyone else's on this campus.

I feel it is my duty to clear up any misconceptions about the glamorous lifestyles I'm sure you all think we have.

We spend hours at a time staring at ancient computer screens on systems sure to crash with the coming of the millennium. "Dude, is that an Apple IIE?" I heard a Collegian newsroom visitor say one day. "Welcome to the Collegian," I said, beaming with pride. And I bet you thought we were technologically advanced down here. No wonder our "hacker" (or is it "cracker?") terminology is not up to par in all our computer crime exposés.

I've spent entire days in the basement; I can't tell you how disconcerting it was to enter the Campus Center one bright Sunday morning, and spend hours cranking out a few quality stories and eating bad delivery food, only to emerge and discover darkness and five feet of snow.

I bet you also didn't realize how dangerous it is being a police reporter. And I don't mean in that threatening–phone–calls–and–stalking sort of way. Rather, you begin to develop this unhealthy paranoia. You are suddenly afraid to walk across campus alone, and worry that if you leave your car in the Campus Center Garage overnight, it will get keyed, simply because you know the cop log you typed up two weeks ago contained such an incident.

Covering court cases has further contributed to my paranoia. The first time I was in Northampton District Court I sat in the crowd, chatting it up with the people around me who all seemed rather nice — until they got called up on charges of rape and larceny, that is. Now I'm afraid to walk around Northampton, convinced the little old lady in front of me is a convicted criminal. You never know; they're among us every day. Eek!

On those rare occasions that I actually do emerge in daylight hours, all sickly and pallid looking, I am almost tempted to run back down. If you hadn't noticed already, this campus is ugly (and for the record, I would like to mention that the "Spring Concert" and "Football Stadium" paintings hanging on the wall down here are the ugliest things I have ever seen).

Stacey Shackford

This campus used to be beautiful. Think Goodell; think Chapel; think Amherst College. UMass used to have a famous elm–lined walkway and golf course greens when it was mainly an agricultural school. Now look around. See Machmer Hall, see the Lederle Graduate Research Tower, see Orchard Hill.

One day, while nodding off on the 15th floor of that monstrosity we call the tower library, I noticed just how prevalent "awful waffle" architecture is on this campus.

"Awful waffle," you know, the Campus Center Hotel and Garage, Tobin Hall, Herter Hall... look around, it's everywhere! Actually, "awful waffle" is the one unifying architectural element on this campus; hideous beige concrete is the unifying building material, and nonsensical building design is equally as common.

Anyone who has ever attempted to navigate the maze known as Morrill knows this; I once got lost hanging up posters in Morrill I (or was it II? or III? or IV?) and I ended up in this dark hallway with scary signs posted on huge heavy doors, warning me about radiation contamination and secret security access codes. "I bet that's where they clone sheep," I thought as I ran away.

The same is true for the Fine Arts Center. I never understood how tiny concrete rooms with poor ventilation and no windows can stimulate creativity. Hey, I bet people who spend all their time in the FAC undergo similar symptoms as Collegian staff members.

And then there's Whitmore — the Pentagon of UMass. Designed to be impenetrable by angry student mobs and protesters. One phone call and all the doors close simultaneously and Chancellor Scott submerges into his secret subterranean shelter.

Hmmm... there seems to be a subterranean pattern developing here. So much activity on this campus occurs underground; I've come to discover. Or if not completely underground, in cold concrete chambers. I suspect that's what gives UMass students their peculiar character. Aesthetic architecture? Rolling green lawns? Who needs 'em? We've got the beautiful campus pond to admire and a cement patio to hang out on during beautiful spring afternoons.

Today's my birthday, you know. I bet you didn't. I will be a whopping double–double... two–two... 22. Woe is me. Woe woe woe. I'm about to graduate and... don't worry, I'm not about to devote the rest of this column to lamenting my lack of marketable job skills. I'm NOT an English major. I'm a classics major.

Yes, I'm one of the few, the daring, the downright strange UMass students who study ancient civilizations and read ancient literature in its original Greek and Latin form. Not that being a classics major makes me any more marketable, but I've got that special something that some of my esteemed Collegian English–major colleagues seem to lack — ambition. Stop your whining, dammit. If you're so talented and creative, write a damn good resumé and cover letter and he done with it already.

Yeah.

Anyway, it's my birthday, and after a few drinks and a few wistful renditions of "She's Like the Wind" at the VFW tonight, all will be forgotten, I hope. I tub you guys anyway (especially Lenny... he's the coolest Collegian boy of all). People who spend so much time together in subterranean chambers tend to form special bonds, I guess. I can't explain it any more than I can explain what the artist was thinking when he/she painted those ugly things hanging in the hallway (did I say ugly? I meant ugly).

Maybe the Collegian is glamorous after all... Nah.

John Edgar Wideman

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

As far back as he can remember, John Edgar Wideman was a storyteller. During grade school, if the teacher left the room, he would be given the assignment of telling the class a story, keeping them entertained and maybe a bit distracted during a time when the classroom could have been turned into a free–for–all.

So it seems only natural that oral tradition would flow into written word, and Wideman would put his stories onto the page.

Of course, even with the acclaim and notoriety, he says he "still has a day job," which happens to be as a professor of English at the University of Massachusetts.

Wideman's earliest models were storytellers. His mother especially used to tell all kinds of stories, and from this he learned and absorbed. He "envied that capacity," the ability to convey to someone else an emotion or a thought.

When he was attending the University of Pennsylvania, he really starting to think about writing. That's when he started making the "life choices" that would lead him to a writing and teaching career.

He got out. He saw America, he saw the world. "Let's see what it's like somewhere else in the world," he said.

This idea of seeing what it's like elsewhere is reflected in his reading and teaching. "I read because I like to learn things. I like to be challenged." Whatever "makes language live for me, make it come alive for me."

He points out that there is no monopoly on writing; no gender, no race holds the one true voice. "Why limit yourself," he says, "to one tradition, one culture?"

He compares America not to a melting pot, but to a deck of cards, "infinitely moving." Each card is distinct, and "America is all of those put together."

"If you pull any card out, even a small one, you jeopardize the structure," he says. In this house of cards, "there is no one black card, and you learn that from Black History Month."

The voices of the country are varied and colorful in John Edgar Wideman's eyes. To him, it is necessary to go to a lot of different sources. "You never know where the most exciting voices can be found," he says.

Ekwume Michael Thelwell

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

A dark wood–carved sculpture of an African man with an upturned face rests on a file cabinet in the office of University of Massachusetts professor Ekwueme Michael Thelwell. A picture of a young Thelwell addressing a large crowd at a civil rights march hangs on the wall next to his desk.

Thelwell poured some tea and put out a thin brown cigarette with his fingers as he prepared to speak about his experience as a civil rights activist, writer and founding chairman of the W.E.B. Du Bois Department of Afro–American Studies.

The Jamaican–born activist came to the United States in 1959 to attend Howard University. In the early '60s, Thelwell was a staff member of the Student Non–Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and worked in the Mississippi Delta with the late Stokely Carmichael (Kwame Ture). He was also centrally involved in the legislative mobilization for the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Thelwell came to UMass that year as a graduate student and was instrumental in the establishment of the Collegiate Community for Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS) as a professor in 1969. The CCEBMS program was instituted to recruit African–American students in the Commonwealth and to set up a tutorial program for students in need of help once they arrived at the University.

"When I came here in 1965 there were only 50 black students," he said. "There were more African students from the continent [than African–Americans]." In the class of 1969 there were 290 African–American students and some Latinos. It was the first real black presence on this campus in its history."

Black History Month is important wherever it is observed, he said, but it is not crucially important on this campus, where black culture and political thought have many outlets. In addition, he said, the existence of the W.E.B. Du Bois Department and notable professors like John Edgar Wideman, Archie Shepp and Jeanette Cole have changed the intellectual climate of the UMass community.

"We have come a certain distance since 1969," he said. "The real issue now is how to build on those gains and see that they are preserved. We ought to be aggressively recruiting new faculty to carry on the mission into a new generation."

SGA President Salwa Shamapande

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association (SGA) President Salwa Shamapande is one of the most visible black students on the University of Massachusetts campus. Since his arrival at UMass three years ago he has been a leader to all of the students.

Shamapande first involved himself on campus as a negotiator for the African Latino Asian Native American students during the Goodell Takeover in the spring of 1997. After, he went on to spend a year on the Executive Cabinet as Secretary of University Policy, and in May it will be a year since the junior was elected president of the SGA.

Shamapande, the son of the a United Nations diplomat who was recently commissioned to go to South Africa, understands how important it is for everyone at UMass to recognize February as Black History Month.

"Black History Month is an important time to refocus our attention on the past and what happened. We can learn from the past and be more creative in the future," said Shamapande.

Although Black History Month was started by blacks for blacks according to Shamapande all students have to do their part. "Students outside of minorities should be asking the question why is this so important? Black History Month is not just black history. It's American history. Slaves were the economic backbone of this country," said Shamapande.

Shamapande is dedicated to pushing for a stronger commitment to black student from the UMass campus, because the black students that make it to a college level are the "cream of the crop. The burden is on us as black students to challenge what America thinks. The higher up we get the less and less of us there are. It's up to black students to help their conditions. I don't think America has the will or the patience," said Shamapande.

It's not a lack of programs at UMass that makes Shamapande question UMass' commitment to their African American students, but rather the stability of the existing ones. "Some of the programs for black students are on respirators. Black faculty and students never know when programs are going to be taken away. Instead worrying about our programs just making it, we should be pushing for more," said Shamapande.

In May 2000 Shamapande will be graduating with an engineering degree. "It is a skill that is excellent to have. It's a discipline, but maybe not the job for me," said Shamapande. Instead of an engineering career, Shamapande sees himself going to Africa, and writing books about Zambia, the country where his parents are from. "Seventy–five percent of the people who live there are poor, and ninety–five percent are illiterate. Too many Africans leave the continent for education and don't return. I don't have to go, but I want to help restore Africa to a stable continent," said Shamapande.

Black History Month facts

For many people, the first names that come to mind when thinking about Black History Month are obvious ones: Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.; George Washington Carver; Rosa Parks, etc.

Unfortunately many people like those listed here, those whose names deserve as much fame, live on, are forgotten. Here are only a few names, there are some of the [illegible] black Americans.

• Patricia E. Bath, M.D. is the inventor of the laser eye [illegible] probe, a medical instrument used to remove cataracts from the eye. Dr. Bath became the first black physician trained at UCLA.

Dr. [illegible] and her [illegible] founded the American Foundation for the Prevention of Blindness.

With [illegible] helped [illegible] for some [illegible]

• [illegible]

• [illegible]

McKinney was inducted into the Black Inventors Hall of Fame in 1978.

• Annie Turbo Malone holds the title of the nation's first black millionaires, a fortune made from her [illegible] hair straighteners, hair growers and conditioners.

Under the name "Poro" Malone built a empire that included Poro College, a black college in St. Louis built in 1917 that trained women to be Poro representatives.

Malone's community contributions are well documented. In the 1920s, she supported two full–time students in every black land–grant college in the nation. She also donated $25,000 to Howard University, at the time, the largest gift by a black American to a black college.

Dylan rocks Amherst

Musical legend Bob Dylan graced the stage at the Mullins Center Wednesday night.

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

As expected, rock legend Bob Dylan put on a thrilling show in front of a William D. Mullins Center crowd.

Pulling tricks out of his sleeve by changing solo tempo and phrasings, Dylan's show on Wednesday night impressed as always. Although it was difficult to make out Dylan's words, the band's eclectic blend of instruments and the mastery of the guitar made for an awe-striking performance. Dylan undulated his audience through slow country blue-ass renditions of songs like "Masters of War" to more upbeat, electric tunes like "Tangled Up In Blue" which he even sported the sunglasses for.

With a colorful career spanning almost 30 years, Dylan donned most of his show to songs from his latest album Time Out of Mind, reflecting the spiritual soul-searching he's been doing as death and loneliness move closer to him.

Perhaps the most covered artist ever, Dylan's poetics have been reused by everyone from The Doors to Hootie and the Blowfish. Bruce Springsteen's earliest work seems heavily influenced by Dylan, a fact pointed out by late Rolling Stone critic Lester Bangs as he dismissed the Boss years ago. If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, then consider Dylan flattered.

The appeal Dylan has found in religion, which heavily influenced his early '80s works, as well as his continuing impact on a younger generation of listeners was the very reason that Pope John Paul II requested Dylan perform for him about two years ago.

However, his older material is still what people came out for, and Dylan did not disappoint. Breaking out later-era hits such as "Gotta Serve Somebody" and "Broken," he pleased the multi-generational crowd.

Dylan has been a witness to an evolution of the concert audience, yet despite the time period it seems younger generations are still dressing the same as in the 70's, which leads one to wonder what the Rolling Stone thinks about the seemingly unchanged.

Opening act Natalie Merchant pulled off an impressive performance as well, despite fighting off the flu. In her usual manner, Merchant jumped around with selections from her days with 10,000 Maniacs, as well as her independent work from Tigerlily and Ophelia.

Merchant was graced with Dylan's back-up on the guitar, despite his subtle presence onstage, lingering in the shadows. A duo between the two could have made for an unbelievable tandem but unfortunately never happened — perhaps due to Merchant's flu.

Merchant thought back to some songs from the 70's and played her own quick rendition of "Sweet Home Alabama," which she said makes her feel "ugly." She then offered a full-length version of David Bowie's "2001 Space Oddity".

Tying up the night, Dylan ended with a four song encore including "Like A Rolling Stone". After a final bow and wiggle (it was really cute), the legend made his exit and left the audience in a slow, comfortable silence.

Absurdity portrays real life

Blue Heart
CityStage, Springfield
Feb. 24–28

The MIFA (Massachusetts International Festival of the Arts) has brought a little piece of London here to Western Mass. with the presentation of Blue Heart, a diptych which consists of two one-act plays, "Heart's Desire" and "Blue Kettle" written by Caryl Churchill.

In the first of the two one-act plays, "Heart's Desire", a family nervously waits for their daughter to return home from Australia. In "Blue Kettle," the main character, Derek, collects mothers by pretending to be the son they gave up for adoption in the 1950's.

In "Heart's Desire," the action of the play unfolds somewhat like the sequencing of a musical canon. The characters enter, present part of a scene, and then stop. Then, set to a brief, up-beat musical interlude, the characters return to their opening places and begin the scene again. Each time the scene is performed, it ends with a different twist.

With each new take, the characters bait the audience with a small bit-bit of information and then leave us hanging. They say startling things like, "but the body was found in our garden!" and then stop and restart the scene, again.

The instances of this zany canon-like technique were quite comical and unexpected, i.e. a woman collapsing, a half-naked, a drunk man storming into the room, a barrage of screaming kids jumping out of the kitchen cabinets, a large ostrich attacking the characters, and two masked, armed men entering and shooting all of the characters.

But by far one of the most unexpected moments for both the audience and the actors was when the fire alarm at CityStage began to go off and everyone was forced to evacuate the theater (I don't think that this happens at all of the performances!).

Through all of those interruptions and this chaos we, the audience, are left to piece together the fragments of this dysfunctional family.

So in its own strange way, under the comedic aspects of this play, there lies a more serious undercurrent of longing, despair, and a deep fear of the unknown.

In "Blue Kettle," the central character preys upon older women by conning them into believing that he is their long, lost son. He claims that he does this as a means of making money from these emotionally vulnerable women, but it soon becomes clear that his motivation for collecting mothers is questionable.

While this scam may seem cruel and inhuman, there is something strangely touching about it too. It seems that Derek rather enjoys the time that he spends with these older women, as do they enjoy being with him. He fulfills his need for excessive mothering, while at the same time he fills a void in the lives of these women, who have wondered for 40 years what happened to the child they gave up for adoption. It is extremely interesting to see just how much these women want to believe that Derek is their son.

Slowly, as the relationships with his "mothers" become more complicated, most of the words in the dialogue between the characters are replaced by the words "blue" and "kettle." At the end, it is almost impossible to understand what exactly is being said. This ambiguity leaves the audience to fill in the blanks. While this may sound exceedingly difficult, it isn't. Through the talent of the actors, most of the dialogue can be deciphered through their use of emotion and body language.

Through the substitution of language and of people, "Blue Kettle" seems to be making a comment on the arbitrarits of human relationships. That is, we are merely who we believe ourselves to be.

Both halves of this diptych Blue Heart were extremely humorous, but at the same time possessed a very real seriousness. The title Blue Heart accurately encompasses the fragile nature of human relationships and the unpredictability of life that is portrayed in these two one-act plays.

Steinbrenner announces Yankees' $1.4 billion merger with the Nets

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In a move that shakes up sports cable TV but won't change George Steinbrenner's role as The Boss, the New York Yankees and the New Jersey Nets signed a letter of intent to merge the two teams into one company.

The deal announced yesterday creates a new holding company, YankeeNets, that the teams value at about $1.4 billion. The baseball and basketball teams will remain as separate subsidiaries under their current leadership, with Steinbrenner running the Yankees, and Lewis Katz and Ray Chambers running the Nets.

"Nothing is going to change here," Yankees manager Joe Torre said.

Knowing the deal would fall in place and give the World Series champions increased cash flow made Steinbrenner comfortable to trade for Roger Clemens last week, according to a source with knowledge of the talks who spoke on the condition he not be identified.

When Toronto first talked about trading Clemens last fall, the Yankees showed little interest, with general manager Brian Cashman saying the payroll was at the maximum. The team didn't hesitate last week when the Blue Jays called again, even though the trade increased the Yankees' payroll to $88 million this year.

Based on early projections of their next TV deal, the Yankees' revenue in 2001 could approach $250 million, which will send a shudder through small-market teams, whose annual revenue is as low as $35 million.

"It's location, location, location," said analyst Bob Gutkowski, the former president of the Madison Square Garden Network.

Steinbrenner's spokesman, Howard Rubenstein, said the chief executive officer of the new holding company had not been determined. But Steinbrenner isn't known as The Boss for nothing, and he is expected to dominate Katz and Chambers.

The biggest change will be in television, with the new company expected to approach both Time Warner Inc. and The Walt Disney Co.'s ESPN unit about starting a new regional sports cable network. The Yankees' $486 million, 12-year contract with Cablevision System Corp.'s MSG Network expires after the 2000 season, and the Nets' contract with Fox Sports New York, another Cablevision unit, expires after the 2001-02 season.

"The announcement puts them in play in terms of third parties who may want to start a regional sports channel, give them a rights fee and an equity position," said TV analyst Neal Pilson, the former president of CBS Sports.

Steinbrenner had been in negotiations last year to sell the team, which, with 24 Series titles is baseball's premier franchise, to Cablevision. But the deal fell apart when Cablevision chairman Charles Dolan wouldn't allow Steinbrenner total control of the team.

Steinbrenner, who led a group that purchased the Yankees from CBS Inc. in 1973 for about $10 million and owns about 60 percent of the team, then approached the Nets, who were bought last autumn for about $150 million, with Katz and philanthropist Raymond Chambers heading the group and comedian Bill Cosby a minority owner. The deal announced Thursday values the Yankees at about $700 million and the Nets at about $150 million. About $350 million in cash will be contributed by new partners such as the investment bank Allen & Co. Inc., and the real estate company Tishman Speyer Properties Inc., according to a baseball official speaking on the condition of anonymity.

That money, the official said, could be used as partial financing for reconstruction of Yankee Stadium or a new Manhattan ballpark, or a new arena for the Nets, who would like to leave Continental Airlines Arena in East Rutherford, N.J., for a new facility in Newark, N.J.

Allen & Co., which is heavily involved in media deals, could eventually get a return on its investment as an equity stake in a new regional sports channel. Tishman Speyer, the landlord of Manhattan's Rockefeller Center, could get the construction contracts for new facilities.

Cablevision, which pioneered the regional sports business in the New York area with SportsChannel in the 1970s, put Steinbrenner in a quandary two years ago when, with financing partly provided by a division of Rupert Murdoch's News Corp., it gained control of both regional sports channels in the New York area.

Cablevision owns a controlling interest in Madison Square Garden, the NBA's New York Knicks, the NHL's New York Rangers, the MSG Network. Cablevision also owns 60 percent of FSNY, which has the broadcast rights to baseball's New York Mets, the Nets and the NHL's New Jersey Devils and New York Islanders.

One baseball official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, speculated yesterday's deal could cause Cablevision approach Mets co-owners Fred Wilpon and Nelson Doubleday about taking an equity position in that team.

"We congratulate the Yankees and Nets on today's announcement," Cablevision said. "Cablevision has enjoyed longstanding, productive relationships with both organizations, and we look forward to continuing those relationships."

ESPN, whose parent company owns baseball's Anaheim Angels and the NHL's Anaheim Mighty Ducks, is one logical partner for YankeeNets.

Skiers set for NCAA Regionals

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

While there is little question of what attracts potential play-makers to big-time programs and sunny coastal institutions, what attracts a winter athlete to a region with such an eclectic climate?

In short, what would ever possess an individual to take up college skiing at Massachusetts?

Perhaps it was the Italian skiing virtuoso Alberto Tomba who said it best: "I have but one simple desire, and that is to tear down the sky." In other words, skiers are deeply driven individuals.

At this weekend's NCAA Regionals in Middlebury, Vt., the key qualifiers from the men's and women's teams will turn inward for the motivation to break on through to the Nationals. After an eight-week "symphony" of team skiing, the time has come for the Maroon and White gate-crashers to solo.

"Last weekend proved our strength as a team," said assistant coach Mike MacConnell. "At this tournament, it's all about the athletes skiing for themselves."

That motivation comes easy for many of UMass's top racers.

Minutewomen Tina King and Lauren Brodey seek to erase the doubt and disappointment that linger from last weekend's conference qualifier, when the women's team narrowly missed the cut. Self-motivation is familiar ground for Brodey, who cut her teeth racing individually in United States Ski Association-sanctioned events.

"With no team at my high school, I competed for years as an individual," said the freshman from Fayetteville, NY, who in 1984 held the distinction of being the youngest ski racer in the nation. "I have no problem getting myself ready to race."

The higher level of competition at Middlebury, provided by northern skiing powers like New Hampshire and Vermont, will undoubtedly provide further fuel for UMass' competitive fire.

"This is a whole different league; these are the big guns of northeastern college skiing," said freshman standout Rich Granger of Princeton, who hopes to overcome the "head problems" that limited his performance at the conference tournament. "You've really got to step up against guys like this."

The opposition provides a boost of a different sort to Ken Thoman, another rookie turning in an unbelievable year for the Minutemen.

"Those are all the schools that said they didn't need someone like me," said Thoman. "It's become kind of a personal thing."

Not that Thoman needed another reason to go faster. The Ohio native's mighty record of seven top-10 runs this season places him among the conference's premier skiers.

While enjoying an equally memorable season, senior All-American and men's team captain Thomas Holden has the memory of a 17th place slalom finish in last year's Regionals to push him. Yet even as Holden raised the bar with five top-3 finishes on the year, he's not about to let his own expectations stand in his way.

"While my past success may give me some confidence, It's not really much of a factor in the post-season," said Holden. "I'm more concerned with just standing up and pushing myself."

The weight of expectation may be the heaviest on King, arguably the best skier on either team. Following a season in which she simply mauled the competition in both alpine events, the Easthampton native could manage only a 33rd place in the slalom (after a solid fourth in the GS) at the conference qualifier. King and Brodey will look to bury the memory of last weekend with a strong showing in Vermont.

"Of course it hurt, but skiing is too much of a mental thing to keep thinking about our mistakes," said Brodey. "80 percent of this sport is what's going on in your head."

As the racers of both teams gear up for the home stretch of '99, what's going through their heads is qualifying for the NCAA Nationals, to take place the weekend of March 10-13 in Maine.

Women's water polo team looks for another big year

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

The start of the women's water polo season this weekend will probably come as a shock to many East Coast teams. Quite simply, these teams haven't had time to recover from what the Minutewomen did to them last season.

Following the best season in team history, in which the team set new school marks with 22 consecutive wins and a 30-6 record, the Maroon and White will open their 1999 action at the Villanova Invitational in Pennsylvania.

The Minutewomen, ranked seventh in the nation in preseason polls, will face No. 15 Michigan on Saturday, then battle Salem-Teikyo and the NOVA Club before concluding the tournament on Sunday against No. 19 Villanova. UMass is 4-0 all-time against Villanova and 2-0 versus Michigan, including a 6-5 double-overtime win at last year's National Championships in California.

"We're certainly capable of repeating what we did last year," said Coach Dan McOsker, the 1998 Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) Eastern Coach of the Year. "But with a younger team, it may take a little while for us to hit our stride."

The 1999 squad may seem younger than it is. Despite an absence of seniors, the Minutewomen count five juniors among their nine returning letter-winners. Third-year starters Katie Grogan and Claudia Clement will share the captain duties, and can both expect to see time at the two-meter position on both offense and defense.

California native Grogan broke her own single-season team scoring record last season, tallying 97 goals and 174 points en route to second team All-American honors. Clement, originally from Guam, finished fourth on the team in points (62), goals (35), and assists (27) in her sophomore season.

Junior Marci Hupp, from Hilliard, Ohio, will provide the main offensive threat for UMass in the two-meter spot. Hupp withstood a trial by fire last season, scoring game- winning overtime goals in the Eastern title game against Maryland and in the first round heart-stopper against Michigan.

The team will also look to third-year standouts Lyndsay Crenshaw and Laurie Edwards to provide added offensive punch from the field positions. The tandem combined for 37 goals and 38 assists during the '98 campaign.

The youth factor comes into play at the goalie position, where freshman Dana Sinkwich will patrol the net for the Minutewomen.

Last year's team captured its first-ever Eastern title and made its second consecutive appearance in the U.S. Water Polo Collegiate I National Championships. And while their eighth-place finish in that tourney ranks as the highest in team history, the women are more proud of their perfect record (23-0) against eastern competition.

"Our number-one priority this season is to defend the Eastern title," said McOsker.

UMass women's tennis season on the line when they face Fordham

By Jason Owens
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team, who started off the week a confident squad prepared to kick off its Atlantic 10 schedule, has suddenly found itself fighting for its life.

Coach Judy Dixon hadn't given much thought to a scheduling change when, earlier this winter, she switched the Minutewomen's match against Fordham from its original April date to today, but due to several unforeseen events, the move is looking worse and worse for a team that desperately needs a win this afternoon.

"This match is huge for us," said Dixon. "And with our health problems and limited resources, everybody will need to step up."

The health problems Dixon is referring to are the losses of singles standout Allie Tross earlier this week to a broken thumb sustained in a car accident, and a flu-ridden Annie Hamilton who's status remains uncertain for this afternoon's match.

In the span of three days, Fordham, described by Dixon as "probably the fifth best team in the A-10", has changed from a team the Minutewomen would ordinarily handle with relative ease to a dangerous opponent that Dixon's squad, whom she considers "probably the second best team in the A-10", might just lose to, with dire consequences resulting.

As if the Fordham scenario wasn't bad enough, the Minutewomen must travel to Providence, R.I. tomorrow to face perennial Ivy League strongwomen Brown University. It is a stretch that could make or break UMass' season.

"If we beat Fordham, we'll probably be ranked second in the A-10 tournament," explains Dixon. "If we lose, we probably get ranked fourth. That would mean we would play Virginia Tech in the semis."

V-Tech is ranked 35th in the East Region this season and according to Dixon "no one has been able to touch them this year."

To replace the injured Tross, Dixon must start April Madonie in the sixth singles spot, a move that concerns Dixon because Madonie hasn't played a match since September due to injuries of her own. That move, coupled with a flu-ridden Hamilton starting at the fifth singles spot, has left the Minutewomen extremely vulnerable to a Fordham team that has upset on its mind.

"We're going to need big performances from Robyn [Lebovitz], Ola [Gerasivova], Jackie [Braunstein], and Helena [Horak]. Our top players are going to have to come up big. The match is winnable, but it will take a colossal effort on everyone's part."

"They [Brown] are a very good team, though probably not quite as strong as Yale or Princeton," said Dixon. They will provide a measuring stick for UMass' players.

Dixon would be pleased with victories in one or more individual matches, but the chance for a team victory, already slim in the first place, may have slipped into the category of "impossible" with the teams' injury problems.

Making the possibility of victory even more remote, Dixon may not be able to bring Hamilton to Providence.

"If her fever doesn't break we won't be able to bring Annie to Brown. The doctor says she can play one match [with the flu] but not two," Dixon said.

Having been shut out by both Yale and Princeton in the team's first two matches, Dixon looks at Brown as an opportunity to boost individual players' confidence.

"We're just looking for individual results and some points against [Brown]."

Still, it's today's match that everything rides on, and Brown aside, it is Fordham that holds the key to UMass's season.

"I'm looking at Fordham as huge in terms of a year-end finish," says a hopeful Dixon. According to a UMass media guide, tennis is a spring sport to be played outdoors.

Spring may be almost a month away, and UMass' courts may still be covered with snow, but make no mistakes — the Minutewomen's season is in full swing, and this weekend's matches may be a better indicator than any groundhog for just how long it will be before a ray of light shines on their schedule.

career highs. Pokrana tied a career high on the uneven bars with a 9.900 and Goldberg burned the mats with a career high on the floor exercise with a 9.875. The Minutewomen will need plenty more of the formula that led them to score new team high totals in each event for the season against a capable URI gymnastics team.

URI is coming off a tri-meet in which they defeated the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers, but fell to New Hampshire. URI throws a lot of young talent into the mix when they come to compete. Freshman Kelly Labowitz is the all-around leader for the Rams with a season high of 38.700 in the overall. Labowitz also holds the team highs in uneven bars and floor exercise as well. She posted a 9.7 on the vault and a 37.750 in the all-around last week. The Rams' team high this season is quite similar to that of the Minutewomen's, 193.5 to 193.925 respectively. URI coach Charlie Connery also gets standout efforts from senior Cristina Marsicovetere on the beam and the floor.

UMass can't afford a letdown, as URI will be looking to deadlock the home-and-home series at a meet apiece, as well as to capture their first conference win of the season.

UMass goes to GA

Softball's trip no walk in the park

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

On the surface, when the four-time running Atlantic 10 Champion Massachusetts softball team returned from a trying 2-3 weekend at the Fiesta Bowl Tournament last weekend their record may not have seemed all that impressive.

However, there is no reason to sound the alarms just yet. Last season began almost the same way. The Minutewomen traveled to Arizona and came back 1-3. They ended the year 45-14 and earned a trip to the Women's College World Series. And considering who those games were against this past weekend, their record is not reflective of their true ability.

The Maroon and White tackled five ranked teams, including a narrow 2-1 loss to No. 3 Arizona and a 3-1 win over No. 7 Texas.

This weekend proves to be no less of a challenge as No. 10 UMass travels to Georgia for the NCAA Leadoff Classic. This tournament features some of the toughest teams in softball. The Minutewomen are scheduled to face Michigan State, Nicholls State, and No. 11 Oklahoma in pool play.

UMass defeated Michigan State and swept their two contests against Oklahoma last season. Lifetime, Massachusetts is undefeated against both Oklahoma and Nicholls State.

Depending on how the tournament pans out, the Minutewomen could face staunch competition. Three teams have entered the tournament from the 1998 College World Series including champion Fresno State, Michigan, Nebraska, and Washington. Four other nationally-ranked teams are in the tournament and could face UMass including DePaul, Arizona State, Florida State and Hofstra.

Massachusetts' No. 10 rank in softball is the highest preseason ranking that the school has received and is due in large part to the early success of senior All-American Danielle Henderson. Already having worked 20.1 innings, she has notched both Massachusetts victories, recorded 30 strikeouts while giving up only three earned runs.

Last season senior co-captain Henderson recorded 430 K's and was the nation's leader in strikeouts per game, averaging 11.9 in a seven inning game. In addition, she holds UMass school season records in wins, earned run average and strikeouts.

Senior Becky George joins Henderson as UMass' other co- captain. The shortstop and left fielder has earned the distinctions of being named a GTE Academic All-District and an Atlantic 10 All-American and batted .289 in the 1998 campaign.

In last weekend's tournament in Arizona, the freshmen contingent to the squad proved to be key additions to a strong Massachusetts team. Both Cherra Wheeler and Ashley Bakken hit over .300. Wheeler collected three runs batted in and had two doubles, including a hit in her first collegiate at bat.

Hoping to build on the momentum of last year's late season run that saw UMass win 42 of its last 47 games, the team hopes to display some early season prowess by knocking off some talented teams this weekend. Early season difficulties have become a characteristic of UMass softball. Last season bobbled out to a 2-10 record before finding its winning form.

As UMass proved last season, it is not how the team starts the season that shows a squad's mettle.

UMass hoops prepare to meet foes in Atlantic 10 tournament

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The new season begins for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, as the Atlantic 10 tournament kicks off today at the Apollo of Temple in Philadelphia.

The Minutewomen (16–13 overall, 11–5 A–10) have earned a first–round bye by virtue of finishing second in the Eastern portion of the conference.

However, after taking in the action today, UMass will face the winner of the Xavier/Rhode Island game at 2 p.m. on Saturday (WMUA 91.1 FM).

WEEKEND PREVIEW

Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien is all but resigned to the notion that her team will face Xavier (11–5 A–10), who are heavily favored over the Rams (1–15 A–10).

"We are pretty much assuming we will be matched up with Xavier on Saturday," O'Brien said. "They are a very tough team, but we are very comfortable with ourselves as a team right now. We are prepared to play against anybody."

The Minutewomen dropped their lone meeting this season with the Musketeers 61–54 at Xavier on Jan. 24.

"We definitely learned something from that game," O'Brien said. "We just needed to execute a little better towards the end, and having Caroline Nehls available to us this time will help if we do play them."

While a matchup with Xavier is likely, the Minutewomen can always hope for an upset, as they handily defeated the Rams twice this season.

UMass won their A–10 opener at Rhode Island 82–38 on Dec. 15, before knocking them off at the William D. Mullins Center 74–63 on Jan. 19.

If the Minutewomen win their second round game on Saturday, they may run into the A–10's top dog Virginia Tech (25–1, 15–1 A–10) on Sunday night at 6 p.m. (A–10 network).

UMass and Tech squared off in the A–10 Final last year at the Mullins Center; a thriller that the Hokies captured, 86–84.

The Minutewomen hung tough with Tech for a half — actually leading 31–30 at the break before the Hokies rallied for a 67–51 triumph on Feb. 12 in their only meeting since last year's final.

O'Brien asserts that the play of her under–manned bench will be critical in the team's fortunes throughout the tournament.

"I will likely be relying on the bench more than usual in a situation like this," O'Brien said. "Tonia (Thomas), Jaywana (Bradley) and Caroline (Nehls) are really coming along lately for us. I'm pretty confident that they are ready to go to work, and that they know what they need to accomplish."

Senior center Yolanda Rayside, who has recovered nicely from a separated shoulder, is expected to receive significant playing time to maintain order on defense and the boards.

The biggest question concerning the team revolves around their physical conditioning, after a grueling season in which the team has played with as few as seven healthy players.

To play three games in three days is always draining, but with only nine players to maneuver with, the task becomes that much greater.

"I believe we are ready physically," O'Brien said. " I have said all along that some teams only work with seven or eight players anyway, so we will continue to just worry about who we have now, and go from there. As long as everybody gives it their all, and comes prepared to play, we will be in good shape."

UMass looks to upset Owls at the Mullins

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Bruiser Flint is the quickest Minuteman skipper to reach the 40–win plateau, and the second quickest to top 50 in that department.

In comparison to Temple Owl coach John Chaney, Flint is but a spring chicken.

UMass (12–15 overall, 8–7 Atlantic 10) will host the Owls (19–8, 13–2) Sunday in an attempt to prevent Chaney from recording his 601st career win.

That task will be easier said than done, as the Minutemen are coming off of a three–point loss to LaSalle on Tuesday. That defeat brought UMass one game closer to losing their third seed in the A–10 Eastern Division heading into the conference tournament. Right on Massachusetts' heels is St. Bonaventure, who, if they come out victorious in their remaining two games, can move ahead of UMass in the standings with a Temple win over UMass on Sunday.

Perhaps working in the Maroon and White's favor, however, is the Owls' performance in win number 600 for Chaney. On Wednesday, the Philadelphia–based team hosted and pummeled Fordham 71–49, but they did so relying more on defense than offense. The 24th–ranked Temple team overcame a somewhat lackluster offensive showing to stifle the Rams with their 2–3 zone defense.

Fordham could only manage 18 points in the opening half in that game, but were only seriously hurt by one Owl — Lamont Barnes — who scored a season–high 23 points.

This style of game benefits Massachusetts in that the Minutemen have had significantly more success in slow–paced, defensive matchups, while the full–court, "run and gun" type of contest tends to tire and overwhelm UMass.

Flint has used forward Mike Babul to thwart the efforts of the opposition's most lethal threat, which, in this case, will be Barnes. Owl guard Pepe Sanchez, who was relatively quiet in the game against Fordham, will most likely square off with Minuteman Monty Mack, who has developed into Flint's best back–court defender.

Offensively, Massachusetts has been unpredictable. While certain players, like Mack and forward Chris Kirkland, have been dependable down the stretch, the UMass scoring output has varied greatly from game to game. After lighting the scoreboard up for 78 points against Xavier at home, the Minutemen could manage only 60 against LaSalle.

Even Mack, who had seemingly been a lock for at least 16 points a game all season, struggled in the matchup with the Explorers, scoring less than 10.

The challenge that Flint faces is that of getting other potential scorers to come through at game time and compliment Mack and Kirkland.

Center Lari Ketner has been good for roughly 10 points and 10 rebounds each time out for the last month of the season, and perhaps the senior, who has apparently fallen short of his preseason NBA–expectations, will surprise the William D. Mullins Center faithful with a breakout performance.

Senior guard Charlton Clarke might also be looked at to share the burden, as Temple's 2–3 zone can be vulnerable to stop–and–pop shooting. Clarke's specialty when he is feeling up to the task.

In the same respect, reserve guard Rafael Cruz, who has eclipsed Jonathan DePina as the first back–court man off the bench, can be occasionally called upon to provide a spark for the Minuteman offense with his shooting range.

UM gymnasts taking on Temple

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

After a big loss to Michigan last weekend, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team competes at its eighth meet of the season tomorrow. The Minutemen face off with the Temple Owls, long–time rivals of UMass. Temple has always posed a threat to the Maroon and White, but this year UMass stands a much better chance at taking home the gold.

Last year, Temple lost key athletes like Darren Gerlach and Aaron Vetter, and hasn't been doing as well this season as it has in the past. These gaps in the Owls' team certainly leave some room for UMass to take control of the meet tomorrow, but Temple will mostly likely still be difficult to defeat.

Temple has some of the best gymnasts in the region, one being Mike Moran.

"Moran is one of the top fourteen gymnasts in the nation, and he will certainly be a major factor in Temple's overall score," said Coach Roy Johnson. "It should be interesting to see the all–around competition, too. Both [UMass junior] Jeff LaVallee and Moran have the potential to win, but we can't count out [senior] Steve Pryor, because he could come right in there and take the title away from both of them."

Both LaVallee and Moran have trained together for years at Tim Daggett's Gold Medal Gymnastics in Agawam. The two have competed against each other throughout their gymnastics careers and most recently at the 1999 Winter Cup Challenge two weeks ago, where LaVallee crushed his former teammate. LaVallee has been a strong competitor for the Minutemen since he first came to UMass, and he continues to pave the way for his team this season.

Stephen Pryor holds the all–time high in the all–around, with a score 57.825, and is a nominee for the Nissen–Emery award this year. This annual prize could be considered the Heisman trophy of gymnastics and is given to the most outstanding senior gymnast in the nation — well deserved by this tough competitor. Pryor can certainly be a threat to both the all–around title, as well as the first place spots on each of the six events.

The gym team has been struggling with injury for much of the season, but has been working on upgrading routines and being consistent both in and out of practice.

"I think there has been a lot of improvement over the past week," said Johnson. "[Sophomore] J.J. Hershey is doing much better on pommels and high bar, and [senior] Dan Young's floor routine is top class. [Freshman] John Szymczyk is coming along on rings, parallel bars, high bar, and pommel horse. He's even beginning to land his dismounts."

Szymczyk had a severe stress fracture in his leg, which required surgery, but has been recently cleared and has been working hard to contribute to his team.

Also expect great things from sophomores Andy Leis and Bryan McNulty, as Leis is in gear to compete pommel horse and high bar, while McNulty will be competing in a new and more difficult vault, giving him the potential to score a perfect 10.

Women's gym looks to fend off Rhode Rams

By Matt Melo

The Massachusetts women's gymnastics team looks to continue their torrid pace as they hit the road again for a rematch against conference foe Rhode Island. North Carolina State and Vermont will also make the trek to the URI campus tomorrow night.

This time around promises to be just as tightly contested, as a perfect season in the Atlantic 10 is at stake for the Minutewomen. The last time UMass (4–3 overall, 3–0 A–10) faced off against URI (4–5 overall, 0–1 A–10), UMass took the season opener 186.5 to 185.725. But a lot has happened since these two tangled back on Jan. 16 in the Boyden Gymnasium. From there, UMass has reeled off a 3–3 overall record and breezed through the A–10 portion of the schedule.

The fact that UMass spent almost a month on the road gives a sense of this team's resilience and poise.

The Minutewomen will be primed for their conference finale after putting together an outstanding effort against No. 2 Alabama last week. Senior Michelle LoPresti led the charge for UMass posting a career high on the uneven bars (9.850) and tied her previous career high on the floor (9.800). The roster will be filled out nicely with the addition of All–American Jill Fisher competing for the Minutewomen. All she did in her second appearance of the season was tie her career high on vault with a 9.875 and post an impressive 9.775 on the beam.

The procession did not stop there as Jennifer Pokrana and Jobi Goldberg also improved on their

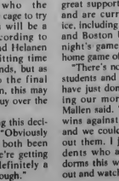
The last time the Massachusetts hockey team visited Schneider Arena to face the Providence College pucksters, the Minutemen were totally overmatched in an 8–1 defeat.

Nothing went right for UMass (10–18–2, 6–13–2 in Hockey East) on that mid–January night. To start off, the Minutemen were at a severe disadvantage by playing with only four defensemen. Add the fact that Providence jumped out to a 3–0 lead after the first period and that neither Mike Johnson nor Markus Helanen were on top of their game on that given evening, and the end result didn't sit too well with UMass.

Since then, however, the Minutemen have been playing some of their best hockey of the season. Winners of four of their last five games and three in a row, UMass will look to continue their winning ways in a home–and–home weekend series against the Friars.

"The first game against Providence, we were drastically shorthanded. We only had four healthy defensemen out of eight," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "We were just trying to patch holes [in our lineup]."

The weekend set will begin tonight at Schneider in a 7 p.m. faceoff and head back to the William D. Mullins Center tomorrow night for an identical start time.



UMass enters the weekend currently stationed in seventh place in the Hockey East standings, one point ahead of Merrimack and two points behind UMass–Lowell. The eighth place Warriors have a game in hand on the Minutemen, while Lowell won the season series with the Maroon and White.

Mallen, however, feels that one of the keys to this weekend will revolve around his team's demeanor against the Friars.

"The most important key is that we just have to go out and determine our own fate. We can't worry about whether the other teams [around us] are moving up or down," Mallen said. "We need to stay focused. Providence has some talented forwards that are guys that we've got to shut down."

Some of the players Mallen was alluding to include Jerry Keefe, the Omicioli brothers Mike and Drew, as well as winger Fernando Pisani. All four players had big games against UMass in the first outing between the two schools.

The question of who the Minutemen will put in the cage to try and stop PC's big guns will be a game–time decision according to Mallen. Both Johnson and Helanen have played well in splitting time over the past few weekends, but as UMass now heads into the final three games of the season, this may be the time to pick one guy over the other.

"I've really been mulling this decision over," Mallen said. "Obviously Mike and Markus have both been playing well, but now we're getting into crunch time. It's definitely a good dilemma to have, though."

Offensively, the Minutemen received a big boost last weekend with the reemergence of Jeff Blanchard, the team's leading scorer. The junior alternate captain had been fairly quiet throughout the middle portion of the season, but has broke out of his slumber as of late.

Add the fact that a variety of contributors, such as R.J. Gates, Jay Shaw, Kris Wallis and Nick Stephens also helped UMass' cause last weekend bodes well for the Minutemen this weekend. And there's also Nathan Sell and captain Dean Stork, who remain tied for the team lead in goals with nine.

"It's really important that with the style that we play to get scoring from a lot of different people," Mallen said. "When we get scoring from a lot of people, it's easier to win."

One key to the weekend that will be on the side of the Minutemen will be home–ice advantage. Providence began their Spring Break today, so many of their students will be heading home for the vacation.

On the other hand, the Minutemen have been receiving great support from their loyal fans, and are currently 7–6–1 on home ice, including wins over No. 2 Maine and Boston University. Tomorrow night's game will also be the final home game of the season.

"There's no question about it, our students and general admission fans have just done a great job of boosting our morale and work ethic," Mallen said. "We've had some great wins against Maine and BU there, and we couldn't have done it without them. I just hope that the students who are sitting around the dorms this weekend decide to come out and watch some UMass hockey."

Interim admissions director appointed amidst scrutiny

By Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has recently announced it is naming a new interim admissions director Vanessa M. Riveria, who seems to have her work cut out for her.

At a time when the administration is under heavy scrutiny by student organizations angry at the decision not to prioritize race in admission policies, and threatening to close the University down, Riveria's transition may not be pleasant.

However, upset students are not the only groups watching the administration. Since July, a Washington D.C.–based organization, the Center for Equal Opportunity(CEO), has requested admissions statistics for its current Affirmative Action/ Higher Education project.

CEO is collecting the data from public institutions nationwide in order to determine whether public colleges are discriminating on the basis of race and/or ethnicity.

The University of Massachusetts is among several other Massachusetts public colleges, CEO has requested admissions statistics from. The CEO is a nonpartisan affiliated agency, conservative in policy according to Roger Clegg, general council and vice president of CEO.

"Our organization believes race and ethnicity should not be a factor for deciding who gets into a college, that people should not be classified by skin color or ethnicity and treated differently because of that," Clegg said.

In addition to examining the admittee's ethnicity and race, CEO is looking at SAT scores and grade point averages as well as asking university's to specify whether a student's income was taken into consideration for admittance.

By analyzing factors such as these, Clegg said CEO can then come to the conclusion of whether or not preference is being given based on race or ethnicity.

In his letter "Towards a Commonwealth of Learning," Chancellor David K. Scott has said that he is committed to recruiting a "freshman class which reflects the diversity of the graduating seniors from the high schools of Massachusetts."

However, Scott said that recent court cases, have "narrowed the acceptable purposes for which an admissions policy with sensitivity to race is acceptable."

Scott said he intends to consider other factors in admissions policies such as economic status, an ability to overcome hardships, and whether the admitee is from the first generation to go to college.

"In our society, it is a fact that a larger fraction of families of color earn lower incomes," Scott said.

Through a campus–wide task force, Scott looks to work with members of the community in finding new approaches to achieving diversity.

Clegg said CEO is not opposed to a university considering an applicant's socioeconomic background, but is wary of making assumptions. "There are more poor white students than black. if you preference to poor students fine, but do so across the board."

So far, Clegg said CEO has found "strong evidence that black students are given preference," like at the University of Virginia where they found the odds to be 45:1 against a white student being admitted and even more in Michigan schools where it is a couple of hundred:1.

Meanwhile, those concerned with the status of minority students are looking for ways to fight the recent admissions decisions.

Nana Mendoza, president of the Graduate Student Senate (GSS), condemns the University as well as President William M. Bulger and said the GSS plans on asking them to reconsider their decision.

The GSS is still deciding on what steps they plan to take in the future but Mendoza said they are still concentrating on their student parent campaign which she feels is closely correlated to the admissions policy since these students "have the capability and intellect to be at the University but they need the support."

Tuition and fees for undergraduates will be decreasing

By Jake Lilien

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees agreed to lower overall tuition costs for UMass students last Friday.

Earlier in the month, the trustees announced that they would cut tuition for in–state undergraduate students by $13, but raise mandatory fees $91. Governor Paul Cellucci expressed anger at the decision, and threatened to cut $4.6 million from the UMass budget. He also filed legislation that would prevent the trustees from setting tuition costs in the future.

As a compromise with Cellucci, the trustees cut the tuition and fees for in–state undergraduate students by 5 percent for the 1999–2000 academic year amongst the four UMass campuses. The tuition will fall 10 percent, as opposed to the 5 percent cut announced earlier. Student fees will still increase, though, leaving UMass students with an average tuition–and–fees cost of $4,704. This marks a $23 decrease from the current cost of $4,727.

Cellucci said in a press release he agrees with the plan, and won't use an earlier plan to cut UMass's budget.

Earlier this month, there were angry reactions from students when, shortly after the proposed increase in student fees, the University announced a 49 percent pay raise for UMass President William M. Bulger. Bulger's salary will not be affected by the new proposal.

This will be the fourth consecutive year that the University has reduced its overall costs for in–state undergraduate students. The trustees maintain that all of the campus improvements promised, when the overall increase was announced, will still occur.

"This plan will give our students the classroom and technological tools they require in a fourth consecutive tuition–and–fees reduction," said Bulger in a press release.

Critical Mass cyclists ride to Northampton to raise awareness

AMHERST — In a "coincidence" Friday afternoon approximately 35 bicyclists rode from the Amherst Town Common to Pulaski Park in Northampton to raise awareness of bicyclists rights, Coolidge Bridge construction, and other issues.

"It just happened like a coincidence," said Chris Dooley a fifth–year University of Massachusetts student participating in the Critical Mass event.

"It's the most environmentally and economically sound form of transportation," said Noah Gordon a UMass senior who said he has been car–free for almost his entire life. "I do grocery shopping and laundry."

Gordon lives in Northampton and commutes 25–45 minutes to UMass everyday by bicycle. He said everyone participates in the Critical Mass, which started its bicyclist's rights campaign in San Francisco in 1992, for different reasons.

"I feel that motorists need to really understand cyclists have just as much of a right to be in the road as they do," Gordon said. He also said

Dominican festivity fills ballroom

As the folkloric dance group, Cayena, finished their performance, the audience jumped to their feet. Applause filled the Student Union Ballroom, as those in attendance showed their appreciation.

This was the scene for much of last Friday at Casa Dominicana's 7th annual Independence Celebration in the University of Massachusetts' Student Union Ballroom.

The cultural night was a celebration of the Dominican Republic attaining independence from Haiti on Feb. 27, 1844.

"I cannot stress enough, the importance of our independence. Our forefather's struggle is what gives us the right today to call ourselves Dominicans. If we did not successfully put this program together, it would seriously cause our ancestors to turn in their graves," said Casa Dominicana's Education Program Coordinator Ceylin Guillermo.

The night began with a video presentation of the different cities in the Dominican Republic.

"It was interesting to see the many different cities and towns in the Dominican Republic. I definitely want to travel there and see it in person," said UMass freshman Paulo Fonseca.

The program then proceeded with the keynote speaker Samuel Tavares. Tavares, being a UMass alumni, is Director of the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta, Ga. Tavares spoke of the importance of one's education and educational experience.

"When I came here in the 1970's, there were only a few Latinos on campus. I could count them on my fingers. We never thought of creating an RSO (registered student organization) to represent our culture, and today UMass has many organizations that represent Latinos," Tavares said.

A poem was then read in Spanish by Francisco Nunez. Nunez's poem expressed the passion and patriotism behind being a Dominican.

After the poem, the Dominican folkloric dance group Cayena sizzled the crowd with their rhythmic motions

Experts say expect disruption not disaster from Y2K glitch

By Jill Carroll

AMHERST — The end is near. Y2K experts said in a forum yesterday — the end of coming into compliance for most Amherst agencies and businesses that is.

Various experts from the Town of Amherst to the University of Massachusetts and others said in the meeting at Grace Church yesterday afternoon that most systems in the town and University are Y2K compliant or are expected to be so by July 1.

"Preparedness is what we've got to be [working towards]," said Representative Stan Rosenberg.

"But we shouldn't be panicked."

Randy Sailer, director of telecommunications for UMass gave an assessment of the University's Y2K status.

"We've focused first on the big systems," Sailer said. "A lot of people are upgrading their way out of the problem."

Departments are responsible for upgrading their own systems, Sailer said, and an exact date to be compliant by has not been set.

Having heat and electricity for the University shouldn't be a crisis, Sailer said, because the heating system is too old to have any computers in it and with students gone for Intersession heating demands will be "substantially less."

The University has issued a report, grading the level of compliance by color. Blue is completely compliant then green, yellow and red which means serious compliance problems or a system that has not been checked yet.

In the report issued Oct. 23 1998 the Logicraft Served CD Databases are listed as red and Housing Services Cable is listed as yellow/red.

Listed as yellow is the Registration System, Financial Aid Management System, Current Human Resources System, Current Financial Records System, Catalog, Circulation, Fines and Reserves System for the library and others.

The rest of the departments are green or blue.

While the University can provide heat, it is not completely self sufficient with electricity, Sailer said.

Amherst Town Manager, Barry Del Castilho, who issued a Y2K compliance report to the Select Board last week, spoke of the five categories the town has for compliance.

The first category was the operation of town computers.

"We're not where we'd like to be on this," Del Castilho said because of staffing shortages.

The second is operation of town equipment affected by embedded chips. Del Castilho said his concern over the unknown chips has lessened.

"[The news,] in fact, is very good. Our Ford Crown Victorias [used by police], ambulances, traffic lights, elevators are OK," Del Castilho said.

Third, he said, is the operation of other agencies the town relies on such as power and water. The fourth cate-

Area students receive award to teach math and science

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

An awards ceremony was held on Friday at Mount Holyoke College honoring the first group of students from eight area colleges given the National Science Foundation's Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics Teacher Education Collaborative award (NSF/STEMTEC).

The awards recipients received scholarships ranging from $1,000 to $5,000 over two years for the encouragement of their commitment to science and math.

Morton Sternheim, professor of physics and STEMTEC project director, hopes the award will encourage students towards teaching science and math.

"The part of the overall programming is to raise the visibility of science and math teaching as a good career," Sternheim said. "The goal is towards helping move students towards that direction."

According to a Five College press-release, young Americans lack a basic knowledge about the world around them and cannot compete in a marketplace that values science and math skills.

"It's a five year grant [funded by the National Science Foundation] to improve the preparation of future science and math teachers," Sternheim said. "In the first year, the award has been given out to around 50 college students from the five colleges and these are students who are interested in becoming teachers."

STEMTEC focuses their scholarships on improving the standards of science and math teachers in hope of leading to the development of new courses and approaches to teaching that emphasize student-active learning.

Sophomore chemical engineer and chemistry major Addis Jackson feels the issues focusing around education start in teaching students how to think scientifically.

"Right now, in education as a major, the upcoming teachers aren't really learning how to teach math and science," Jackson said. "They're being taught how to teach. STEMTEC is trying to teach people how to teach math and science through active learning."

Jackson was one of seven five college recipients to receive a $5,000 scholarship.

Junior math major Laura Toomey was also a recipient of the scholarship and she feels it is important to have teachers with an extensive background in math and science because they have more of an ability to make the material more interesting.

"It's important to have math and science professionals in the younger grades because that's when kids have more of an ability to be inspired to learn," Toomey said.

Applications for the next round of NSF/STEMTEC Teaching Scholars awards are due April 15.

Kids not hurt by mothers working study by UMass psychologist says

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Children of women who work outside the home suffer no permanent harm because of their mother's absence, a study that evaluated the development and health of more than 6,000 youngsters suggests.

"I found there was no difference between children whose mothers were employed versus children whose mothers were not employed during the first three years," said Elizabeth Harvey, a psychologist at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. "Being employed is not going to harm the children."

Harvey's study, published in the March issue of the journal Developmental Psychology, came to a different conclusion than some earlier studies of the same group of children. The new work examined the children at a later age, 12 years old.

This suggests, said David Eggebeen of Pennsylvania State University, who co-authored an earlier study, that problems detected in children of working mothers at age 3 and 4 may have gone away by the time the children were 12.

"Harvey's study suggests that the number of hours spent away from home is not as important as the quality of parenting," said Lindsay Chase-Lansdale, an associate professor of human development at the University of Chicago. She called the Harvey study "an important contribution" but not the final answer on issues relating to children and working mothers.

In the study, Harvey used data from the National Longitudinal Survey of Youth, an in-depth interview study of 12,000 young people between the ages of 14 and 22 that started in 1979. Harvey concentrated on children born to the women in the study after 1980. The children were assessed every other year from 1986 to 1994. There were more than 6,000 children of all races in Harvey's study, most evaluated more than once. The youngest child assessed was 3, the oldest 12.

Harvey used standard psychological tests to evaluate children's language development, academic achievement, self-esteem and behavior problems. Some of the results were based on reports of the parents.

In comparison with children of mothers who did not work, Harvey said she found no statistically significant difference in any of the measures.

However, when comparing children within the group of mothers who had outside employment, Harvey found very slight differences that were dependent on how many hours the mother worked and how soon she started work after the child was born. Some women in the study returned to work as quickly as four weeks after giving birth, while others waited three years.

A Celebration of Diversity: Dreams of disabled people

By Veronica MacDonald
Collegian Correspondent

They came together with the hope of making dreams come true — the dreams of mentally and physically disabled peoples in particular.

This inspiration was the basis of Saturday afternoon's "A Celebration of Diversity," an event based on a grant project called Open Arms, sponsored by Amherst Leisure Services.

The Open Arms event was held in the Amherst Grace Church Parish Hall, to discuss the dreams of disabled members and the role Amherst plays in their lives.

Open Arms is collaboratively funded by the University of Massachusetts and their Department of Mental Retardation.

Ezzell Floranina, project coordinator of Open Arms, believes that dreams are human and come from the heart, so everyone deserves to fulfill them. Floranina claims that "I dream, I always do... every day."

Open Arms, working with seven UMass interns, believes that every appearance is gifted and dreams can become reality through supporters.

A video was shown asking the Open Arms clients what their dreams are. Some responses were to give back to the community, meet long-term friends, make the honor roll, and tape loon calls. Others want to become a chef, fire fighter, or a parent.

Chris Wood, a client of Open Arms, feels that many people in Amherst do not see or recognize people who are homeless or disabled. Other students do not come into his special needs classroom.

"A Celebration of Diversity" began with a Tibet Freedom Song sung by Gyaltsen to create eternal peace and trust in remembrance of the limitations placed on people around the world. Joshua Jay Waffles and T. Clown with his All Star Junk Band, Pathfinders Learning Center's Jazz Ensemble, and Voice of Revival Gospel Choir performed for the event.

Floranina led "When You Wish Upon a Star" as a segway into the Dream Path Banner portion of the event. At this time, other dreams were shared such as being happy, finding beauty in all people, and building a community that genuinely welcomes everyone.

Floranina discussed March as Disability Awareness Month and ways to change bias and violence towards the disabled. She feels the first step is awareness, the next is to rid the idea that some people are lesser, and lastly to reach out of normal boundaries to support others and their dreams.

Maintaining the funds for projects like Open Arms will be the decision of Amherst voters on the next town ballot. Leisure Services would like to maintain disability services by hiring a special needs coordinator if another grant is supported by voters.

riding in a car only adds to a culture of "instant gratification."

One local issue that drew some cyclists to Friday's ride on Route 9 during rush hour, was a lack of space provided for cyclists in renovation plans for the Coolidge Bridge.

Van Kaynor, an Amherst resident said there was only going to be a two-and-a-half foot wide bike lane after the renovations. He said he would like to see the space allotted for car lanes reduced, to give cyclists a few more feet.

Kaynor said he frequently uses his bicycle to get around and has fit six bags of groceries in the small trailer attached to his bike.

A flyer for the event summed up its mission.

"Whether driving alone or squeezing into overcrowded, delayed busses, the transit nightmare is at your expense! But there is an alternative to this madness... Ride a bicycle!"

Some cyclists attended Friday's event to raise awareness of the problems with the road surface.

"I get frustrated [when] the road surface where cars drive is really clean [but there is] debris scattered to the side [where cyclists ride]" said Chris Clow, a Hampshire College student.

As far as safety during the commute on Route 9, the cyclists rode on the shoulder and most had flashing lights on their backs and helmets.

Gordon said, however, the risks from riding in the event were no more than the usual faced by cyclists.

The cyclists said they could not travel on the bike path that is parallel to Route 9 because it is not cleared of snow and in the summer it is too crowded to ride on as a commuter.

Leaflets handed out by the cyclists apologized for inconveniences and encouraged others to join.

"We're sorry you're not already out here on your bicycle riding with us! But we heartily invite you to join us next time," a leaflet said. "We're sorry if we've contributed to your delay."

The cyclists first circled the Town Common, some with children and stereos in tow, then continued down Route 9.

Massachusetts seeks to provide affordable excellence," he went on to say. "I am happy to report that we are becoming even more affordable while our academic excellence continues to grow."

Robert Kuras, the president of the UMass Board of Trustees, said trustees were also satisfied with the changes.

"Those who care deeply about public higher education have achieved their goals," he said.

"Governor Cellucci wants to reduce student charges and that is happening. The University is determined to provide its students with the necessary tools, and that will happen."

He stated that the revenue provided by the fee increase will pay for "new classrooms, new computers, improvements to buildings, new campus centers in Boston and Lowell, and the fiber-optic wiring of the five-campus system."

High school grads reunited by charges of treasury check scam

BOSTON (AP) — Back when they went to Malden High School, Marty Robbins and John "Trixie" Trischitta were far from partners in crime.

The two ran in different circles: Robbins was the star of the school football team and an honor student. Trischitta was the affable oversized kid with the clipboard, who helped varsity lettermen as a manager of four school teams.

Three decades later, the unlikely pair stand accused in a scheme to steal $6.5 million from the state's unclaimed money fund. The image of the two under the same dark cloud is the talk of Malden barbershops and bars, where residents remember them as two very different people.

Prosecutors say Trischitta, 47, helped Robbins, 51, fraudulently claim money from a fund that holds state-issued checks that go unclaimed for a year. They allege Robbins offered a $50,000 bribe to Trischitta.

State officials were alerted to the missing money two weeks ago when Robbins tried to withdraw it from an escrow account at BankBoston.

Robbins, a divorced father of three who maintains residences in Peabody and Lincoln, N.H., worked as an "heir finder," finding unclaimed money for people or organizations and collecting it for a lucrative fee. In this case, prosecutors said he was claiming the money on behalf of the defunct Cambridge Economic Development Corp. Before choosing his latest career, Robbins left behind a number of failed business ventures, including a bankrupt salvage business, according to The Boston Globe. The paper said he has been dogged by allegations of fraud by former business partners.

His former wife accused him in divorce proceedings of keeping up a lavish lifestyle including a country club membership, a luxury apartment, and a new Jeep, despite declaring personal bankruptcy. Trischitta, of Stoneham, has worked as treasury employee for 20 years, starting as a teller for the office in 1978.

Both Trischitta and Robbins were involved in Malden's public access television station when it opened in the early 1970s and friends speculate the two might have become acquainted then. But an unidentified friend of Trischitta told the Globe that Robbins and Trischitta had met only recently since high school. Even as adults, however, the two were still very different. While Robbins had a zest for fine cars and travel, Trischitta owned an aged and run-down Honda Accord. Robbins was eager to be in the middle of the action. Trischitta enjoyed his place on the sidelines — managing a men's basketball team and spending summer nights watching sports at a local park.

After more than a decade away from Malden, Robbins returned last fall in his new role as heir finder with an offer for Mayor Richard Howard: He could help the city get its hands on millions of dollars in economic development fees for a price, reported The Globe.

gory is the updating of the Amherst Emergency Management Plan and surrounding towns and fifth is the emergency preparedness of citizens.

One major concern is the newest and computerized, waste water treatment plant.

"Reports continue to be good, both from our personnel and vendors and from other water utilities...Amherst's water and wastewater plants and pumping facilities should be able to provide enough water (and wastewater treatment)," Del Castillho wrote in his report to the Select Board. "The highly computerized Atkins Water Treatment Plant may be an exception, but that plant is not needed to provide sufficient water in January."

Robin Brown, a representative from Western Massachusetts Electric Co. who is responsible for electricity distribution and emergency preparedness, said the company is investing $30 million to be Y2K compliant by June 30.

He said the company, owned by Northeast Utilities, is 76 percent of the way to fixing all software and 83 percent of the way to fixing any embedded chips.

Embedded chips that are time sensitive was an issue addressed by several of the experts. The concern is there are microchips no one knows about that have the Y2K problem.

Brown said if an embedded chip caused a problem with the supply of fuel, the company has a 20-40 day supply of oil for power plants and a 30-60 day supply of coal.

But what worried one audience member was a breakdown of the nuclear power plants.

"[There is] no probability whatsoever there will be a leak from nuclear plants as a result of anything to do with this problem," Brown said. "The biggest problem we have is the billing system."

Elise Ames, information officer and Y2K coordinator for Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton spoke of the hospital's compliance. She said 5 percent or less of the medical equipment have embedded chips and "not too many of these are date sensitive."

She said the facilities are in full compliance and the largest concern is a breakdown in insurance companies ability to pay. Patients will still be accepted even if their insurance company cannot pay right away. Ames said the only concern is getting the insurance companies to eventually pay. The hospital is creating a fund, she said, to have 2-3 months of cash on hand for financial needs.

Rosenberg said in an assessment of the rest of the country's Y2K compliance, Massachusetts received a "a good hard core C."

"They were absolutely amazing! I can't believe how excellently choreographed they were. They looked more like professional dancers than UMass students. One cannot deny that there performance made the night exciting," said UMass-Lowell junior Raquel Gonzalez.

Following the dance performance, Samuel Tavares was awarded with a "Lifetime Achievement Award" on behalf of Casa Dominicana. Chairperson Francellis Nunez presented the award to Tavares.

"The speaker was a very inspirational person. It's good to know that Dominicans are moving up the ladder," said UMass freshman Ana Genao.

At the termination of the program, the party began. UMass' Concepto Latino provided the music before the popular Dominican music band La Banda Gozo entertained the 700 plus people in the Student Union Ballroom.

"The band was gigging. They were sexy and we really felt their energy," said UMass freshman India Fontes.

The event drew people from many backgrounds, and included on-campus as well as off-campus individuals.

UMass freshman Myrlande Laine summed up the night saying, "Being a Haitian student, it was good to chill with people from my island."

ABUJA, Nigeria (AP) — Retired Gen. Olusegun Obasanjo appeared increasingly certain yesterday to win Nigeria's presidential vote, the final step in the nation's long-awaited transition to civilian rule.

BEIJING (AP) — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright arrives in China to deliver a strong rebuke to Chinese officials for a "deplorable pattern" of cracking down on political dissents, which continued with fresh actions surrounding her visit. A State Department spokesman suggests that lack of improvement by China on human rights and other irritants could impede progress on the secretary's main current mission, to negotiate terms for China to join the World Trade Organization.

MARJAYOUN, Lebanon (AP) — Lebanese guerrillas detonated twin bombs along a road in southern Lebanon, killing four people including an Israeli brigadier general— the most senior officer to die in Lebanon since the Israeli invasion in 1982. The attack, just days after an ambush in which three Israeli soldiers were killed, puts Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government on the spot during an already tough re-election battle.

WASHINGTON (AP) — With few chances to use military force to stop terrorists, the United States is turning to a lower-profile tactic. The CIA calls it "disruption"— working with foreign law-enforcement services to harass and hamper terrorists around the world before they can pull off major attacks.

LIKOSANE, Yugoslavia (AP) — Kosovo Liberation Army rebels raise their blood-red flag, emblazoned with a black two-headed eagle, as patriotic anthems blare across the sweeping plateau. Some 4,000 civilians and rebels gather for the memorial service in Likosane, the tiny village where Kosovo's war started exactly one year ago with the Serb police killing of 24 ethnic Albanians. In the past year, the KLA has grown from a hit-and-run guerrilla band into a rebel army with the power to foil a U.S.-led push for peace.

HAVANA (AP) — Magaly De Armas said she knew life would be hard as the wife of one of communist Cuba's best-known dissidents when she wed Vladimiro Roca seven years ago. One of the toughest moments of all is now. Roca and three other opposition leaders go on trial today amid a new crackdown on political dissidents. The case is seen as a test of how far the government is willing to bend to international opinion while maintaining its tough new stance.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Almost daily for the past two months, American and British warplanes have hammered Iraq with missiles and bombs in a low-grade war of attrition. The Clinton administration insists it is nothing more than dutiful enforcement of "no-fly" zones protecting minority Iraqis in the north and south. But it is also an avenue toward the administration's goal of removing Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

WASHINGTON (AP) — They are the Celtics and Lakers of New Jersey politics. Rome and Carthage. Mr. Hatfield and Mr. McCoy. Their political conflicts defined the 1990s in New Jersey and influenced national conventional wisdom about taxes, campaign promises and the public's appetite for bad news. Now fate and term limits may conspire to pit Republican Christine Whitman against Democrat Jim Florio yet again.

MEDIA, Pa. (AP) — Five best friends gather to make a high school health video about the dangers of smoking and drugs. Ten days later, the girls are killed when their car plows into a utility pole. In the bloodstreams of four, including the driver, are traces of a chemical named difluoroethane. Inside the crumpled car, troopers find a can of "Duster II," a spray used to clean computer keyboards. Its ingredients include difluoroethane. The coroner's findings put the teens on a list of 240 people who have died from "huffing" inhalants since 1996, according to the National Inhalant Prevention Coalition.

YAKIMA, Wash. (AP) — Ten years have passed since the pesticide Alar briefly gave red apples all the appeal of the poisoned fruit offered to Snow White by the evil queen. An environmental group's 1989 report on the risk of chemicals in children's foods suddenly gave wholesome, nutritious apples a deadly reputation. School cafeterias banned them. Grocers posted signs proclaiming theirs were Alar-free. Uniroyal Chemical Co. pulled Alar off the market. But 10 years later, it's still unclear whether Alar was really a hazard. And the broader debate over food safety continues to make news.

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — Gov. Christie Whitman fired the head of the New Jersey State Police yesterday after he said in a newspaper interview that minority groups were more likely to be involved in drug trafficking.

The Black Ministers Council of New Jersey and the state chapter of the NAACP had been calling for State Police Superintendent Col. Carl Williams' ouster for weeks, saying he was not acknowledging a history of racist procedures on the part of the State Police. Whitman said yesterday the state's law enforcement system must be carried out free of bias. She said Williams' comments are inconsistent with our efforts to enhance public confidence in the State Police."

Her spokesman, Pete McDonough, said Williams' comments were the last straw in an already hostile situation between minorities and police officers.

Williams has come under fire over allegations that the agency practices racial profiling, targeting minorities for traffic stops. In an interview with The Star-Ledger of Newark published yesterday, Williams said he did not condone racial profiling, but said it's naive to think race is not an issue in drug crimes.

"Two weeks ago, the president of the United States went to Mexico to talk to the president of Mexico about drugs. He didn't go to Ireland. He didn't go to England," Williams said.

"Today with this drug problem, the drug problem is cocaine or marijuana. It is most likely a minority group that's involved with that," said Williams.

Williams, 58, has repeatedly said he has never condoned racial profiling. But he told the newspaper some generalizations can be made.

"If you're looking at the metam phetamine market, that seems to be controlled by the motorcycle gangs, which are basically predominantly white," he said. "If you're looking at heroin and stuff like that your involvement there is more or less Jamaicans."

McDonough said Williams' comments were unacceptable.

"The comments were insensitive and absolutely counter to bolstering confidence in law enforcement," McDonough said. "There are vast segments of the New Jersey public, whose confidence in the system is shaken."

Last week, The Associated Press reported that the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division had been investigating the New Jersey State Police for two years.

Williams was not immediately available for comment, and a state police spokesman, John Hagerty, did not return messages.

NORTON, Mass. (AP) — The body of a 9-year-old boy who disappeared while looking for his dog in a snowstorm was found yesterday by a shallow stream about 300 yards from his family's home, in an area that had been searched several times before.

The body of Corey Anderson was found curled in a ball in dense underbrush along the banks of an icy brook after the stripes from his Boston Bruins jacket caught a searcher's eye, police said. When asked why the boy would be in such a spot — with growth so thick an adult would have to crawl on hands and knees to enter — Massachusetts State Police Trooper Paul Hartley's voice cracked as he responded: "He got lost."

Messed up in the headbang

Society today is plagued by an increasing number of addicts. More and more people find their lives controlled by certain substances — oftentimes these substances are lethal.

I, too, am a victim of this vicious trend. I am addicted to Metallica.

The greatest metal band of all time won their first Grammy this year; an award that is years overdue. There's no need to be neglecting Metallica. In fact, the academy's consistent overlooking of this group was downright hurtful. Yet, there seemed to be No Remorse on their part.

My devotion to these legends runs deep — probably to the point of clinical psychosis.

Seth Koenig

One tell-tale incident that comes to mind happened about a half-a-year ago. Last summer. I drove from my humble abode in Durham, Maine, to Great Woods Concert Park here in Massachusetts to see Metallica play. To many others, this was another in a long line of concerts viewed. To me, this was a religious calling.

So much so, that I took it personally when others at the show conversed ignorance in the ways of the Southern California band.

At one point, James Hetfield (the singer, for all of you out there with horribly deprived childhoods) told the capacity crowd that the band was going to leave the electric instruments behind to do an acoustic set centered around the songs "Motorbreath" and "The Four Horsemen."

To my dread, two supposed Metallicats in front of me turned to one another and shrugged. "Motorbreath?" "The Four Horsemen?" They had no idea.

When the songs began, I decided to Jump in the Fire by joining Hetfield in softly caressing the new take on the old lyrics, which, for the uneducated readers, were released on the album Kill 'Em All in 1983.

The two boobs in front of me continued not to know what was going on. They had no idea how maniacally enraged the kid standing behind them was. My mind was Blackened. They didn't even know the words.

All sorts of soul-searching questions penetrated my heart and created a Struggle Within. How did security let these guys in? What would James say about these worthless excuses for fans? Could I kill them with my Metallica T- shirt and get away with it? If a speed-boat left drummer Lars Ulrich's home country of Sweden travelling west at 55 mph and an oil tanker meanders south from the same point two hours later going 42 mph, what would the approximate resulting vector quantity be six hours after the first boat left?

All of these are important questions, obviously.

I decided to let them live, reminding myself that at one point in time I, too, did not have all the words to the Metallica library memorized. I would give them time. They would not be The Unforgiven to me this time, but if I found those two at the next concert and they hadn't done their homework, the penalty will be severe (Seek and Destroy?).

I had to catch my breath for a minute and return to reality; I had to remember why I came to show — I wasn't there to be everybody's Fixxer.

The acoustic versions of the old thrash epics were The Cure for my anger, and I deeply regretted forgetting my mini-cassette recorder when leaving Durham. There was no way I could have a precious copy of these remakes. It was Sad But True, but the potential tape would turn out to be The Thing that Should Not Be.

To make matters worse, the local radio stations avoided playing any Metallica during the ride home. The disc jockeys mentioned the show, for sure...

Hey, right about now, the Metallica show is letting out, and I bet those people are so charged it's unbelievable! I'd be willing to put money on the fact that they'd kill to hear more! Here's Matchbox 20!

And so, along with my brother Nate, who had accompanied me to Great Woods, I went through withdrawal. Just as I was reaching the Frayed Ends of Sanity, we made it back to Durham, where I could rummage through my personal collection of music to quench my unnatural thirst. It was an animalistic instinct: I felt as though I had reverted to a primal life Of Wolf and Man.

I admit it: I need Metallica. Nothing Else Matters to me, and as for that wondrous concert, The Memory Remains. Mama Said I had a problem...

Israel: tired of war

The first time I ever went skiing, I remember going up the ski lifts, thrilled to see the top of the mountain, until I saw barbed wire and a sign that said: WARNING: MINES. The ski lift stopped right below, and a uniformed guard instructed us to dislodge and ski down from this point. Since Mount Hermon is divided among Lebanon, Israel, and Syria, its top doesn't belong to Israel. Therefore, the country's only ski resort offers, at best, a half-way ski trail.

But such is the reality in Israel, my native country. Upon hearing the Israeli Consul General to New England speak in Amherst last week, memories such as this flooded my mind. His struggles with questions Americans asked reminded me of myself, trying to answer friends' questions like, "Why can't they just make peace in the Middle East?"

The main difficulty in answering this kind of claim is the lack of understanding many Americans exhibit about the subject. Israel, unlike the U.S., doesn't have Canada for its front lawn. Indeed, Israel is so tiny that an air jet could go for an extra minute and find itself on enemy land. At some points, the border is only a few miles away from the Mediterranean sea, and whoever lives there has to deal with a pointed gun on one side and deep water on the other. The issue of security in such small space is crucial to the Israelis. Israel hasn't had a peaceful decade since its establishment.

When the leaders of Israel attempt to make peace with the Arabs, many times they find themselves dealing with a deeply fragmented and hostile environment. For example, Israel's peace accord with the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) doesn't guarantee that attacks from other terrorist organizations, such as the Hizballa and Hamas, will stop. Also, when Israel seeks to make peace with neighbors, it has to deal with military dictators who will not necessarily respect the peace treaty after it is signed. That's what the consul meant when he said that ultimately, it is no peace accord that ensures the safety of Israelis, it is military presence.

Natty Yagudin

The fragility of the peace process shows through the failure of PLO Chairman Yasir Arafat to curb terrorism coming from his own people. The reality of external as well as internal terrorist attacks continues to drive whole cities to spend the night in bunkers. Terrorist bombings still happen. I myself remember brushing with death one summer day on the beach of Tel-Aviv, Israel's largest city. I was lazily tanning when I heard the sirens of police cars zooming by. I later found out that a terrorist had left a bomb in a duffel bag on the beach, and a thief had stolen the bag and found the bomb before it exploded. If it wasn't for the thief, you probably wouldn't be reading this article now.

Israel, however, can't rely on fateful twists to ensure its security. The beach incident happened two years after the initial peace agreement with the PLO was signed. How can the country's leaders entrust their citizens' lives onto a peace agreement that may not be effective in the first place? Why would Israel give up land and let terrorists breathe fire even deeper into their homeland? The country's leaders are tough negotiators, not without a reason: they negotiate for their lives.

Whenever I go by the Campus Center and see the leaflets supporting the Palestinians, I stop to realize that every conflict has two sides. However, the current situation doesn't leave many options for the Israelis, as it never had. For many of them, the choice is either to ensure their own security or be thrown out to sea. This year, Israel stands at an important turning point, as its May elections will determine the future leaders who will carry on with the peace process. In talking about the elections, the consul noted that the Israelis are tired of war. They don't want any more bombs on beaches or barbed wire on their borders. I can only hope that such is the wish across the fence.

Short-changing minorities

In times where the U.S. Congress is moving to enact new reactionary laws which will affect much of the advancements that minorities have acquired, the removal of affirmative action programs in the University is not surprising. What is surprising is the apathetic reaction to such proposals by minority students on campus.

To understand the issues of affirmative action, one must see the debate from both sides. As a Puerto Rican male, I believe that affirmative action is a necessary tool for leveling out the playing field for college admissions. The American system is and has always been, advantageous to the white population. Schools in predominantly white neighborhoods have always been academically stronger than those in inner cities.

> "As a Puerto Rican male, I believe that affirmative action is a necessary tool for leveling out the playing field for college admissions."
> Rene Gonzalez

I can attest to this. As an Amherst resident for more than 10 years, I have gone through schooling in the Amherst public school system. Amherst schools are known for their high academic value. I can only imagine how well-taught our fellow minority students are in the University, which brings up the other side of the debate.

I can sympathize with white students who feel affirmative action is unfair to them. I'd feel cheated too if I had worked hard to achieve a 4.0 GPA and my application was rejected to make room for a 3.0 minority student. But what angers me about our leaders, the white community and anti-affirmative action organizations, is that they protest very passionately the fact that minorities are getting an unfair advantage in education but refuse to see that the system is advantageous to them in all aspects of life including education.

Why do we continue providing the U.S. military with unbelievable amounts of money, but neglect the crisis from within? Inner cities are being overrun with poverty, crime, and police brutality. The people are losing hope and peaceful protesting can only do so much. The L.A. riots seemed to prove that only when minorities went to extremes to gain justice did the system move to pursue it. Do you know about the Amadou Diallo case? The Mumia Abu-Jamal case? The removal of affirmative action programs across the country? These are not isolated incidents. These are all manifestations of what the system sows. The system is sowing ignorance and poverty, and it is reaping anger and violence. There should be no surprise about this.

There needs to be some middle ground. My opinion is that new laws should be passed that are designed to upgrade current school systems in urban areas so that minorities can begin to compete in the real world on equal footing. Once this equal footing is achieved, we could consider the removal of affirmative action programs, seeing that they would not be needed anymore.

The problem with this idealistic view is that there is a lack of funding to make these changes work. Here is where I appeal to my brothers and sisters. Wake up! Your parents and grandparents struggled, sometimes violently, to give you the chance to better your situations. We cannot rely on government officials to make decisions about what types of lives and opportunities we should have. We, as a society, must make the changes. On a campus where minorities make-up less than 15 percent of the total amount of students, any less would be a disgrace not only to minorities, but also to the white community who refuses to acknowledge their advantages. It is up to the minority students to speak up and let their leaders know that they want to learn too. Malcolm X was not preaching violence when he said, "By any means necessary." He was preaching action.

I'm a Barbie guy

In these trying times of gay toys and moral decline, one more American institution is under attack. Barbie is the newest of the social evils to attack the moral fibers of our overly sensitive nation.

Let's get one thing straight to start with — Barbie is one hot mama for a woman in her late 40s. For some reason Barbie has been getting tons of bad press lately. I can't even begin to understand how a doll that can't speak, move, or even dress herself can destroy the lives of young women everywhere. In a new book by Ophira Edut (don't worry, I can't pronounce it either) Barbie comes under some pretty heavy attacks.

Brian Lohnes

I don't want to sound like a big goon here but what the hell is wrong with people?! Why would you choose Barbie, who incidently is a doll, to go after and raise a ruckus about? I do realize that if Barbie was "real"-sized she would be missing a few ribs and she would wear shoes that wouldn't fit a midget rat. But why choose to attack an inanimate object when there are living, breathing people like Kate Moss, and other models that are a lot more feasible to attack than a doll.

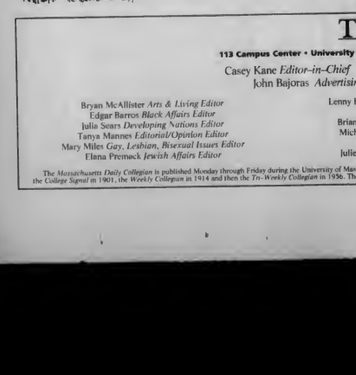
Edut said, "My father was a Jewish immigrant and I felt like a freak. I was a 5-foot-1-inch Jewish woman instead of a Barbie." I am sure that this woman did not attend schools with hundreds of Barbie and Ken clones wandering around, driving pink Barbie Corvettes who struggled to walk because of a distinct lack of moveable joints in their bodies.

I am a 6-foot white kid and I am not built like He-Man, and I am not about to throw myself off the seventh floor balcony in Webster.

Barbie shouldn't be the only one attacked here. I loved He-Man a lot growing up and if he was real-sized he would be about ten feet tall, his feet would be the size of Yugos and his arms would be about as big around as my Microfridge. I do not feel disappointed at all that I don't resemble He-Man in any way except for the fact that we both share four major limbs.

These days it seems that there are way too many people with way too much time on their hands. For example, the writer describes herself and her friends as "vending machine philosophers, girls who sat around scarfing down Snickers bars and talking about the way that teen magazines and T.V. shows fucked up our self-esteem." That to me screams award-winning author and I will run to the book store to plunk down my hard cash for this brilliant Barbie-bashing manifesto.

I just don't quite get it; Barbie is proportioned like she is because she is a doll. The fact is, she isn't real-sized, and she isn't the model for women to look like. Barbie has a few tricks up her sleeve that weren't mentioned in Edut's book. She can survive falls from great heights without a parachute; she can touch her legs to the back of her head without bending them; she can be swung around by her hair and not let out a whimper.



I am a little worried to be living in a society where toys are given a sexuality and inanimate objects are "ruining lives."

Hopefully my kids will learn to appreciate Barbie for her intended use. i discovered this use when I was about twelve because she made a perfect launch pad for my model rockets. People these days need to step back and not take everything so seriously. Teletubbies aren't gay. Barbie may be out-of-proportion — but she is a doll, and He-Man is still one cool dude.

On a side note, in last week's column I said that the Republican club had 40 members. I would like to correct myself and say that they have over 100 members, which, by the way, still gives me hope for the future.

that the hungry No. 4 was not to be overlooked despite his often-attacked year. Ketner grabbed the first three rebounds of the second half, while putting a short hook in over his usual entourage of defenders.

At the 16:46 mark in the second half, Lyde became the first Owl to successfully make it around the big Minuteman. Ketner's rival, having worked his way into facing the basket from the right baseline. Finally! Lyde went straight up for the two-handed shot....

Try again. Ketner put a big right hand through the Owl shot from behind. Around this time in the game, UMass was starting to pull away, solidifying a lead that would ultimately cement them in third place in the A-10 Eastern Division.

Ketner would reject Barnes one more time before the day was over to record four total blocks on the afternoon to compliment his 15 rebounds. Four of his eight points came via crowd-jarring slams that further demoralized the visitors.

Now no matter what can be said about his senior season at UMass, no one can argue what Lari Ketner has accomplished in his career at the school — especially not Temple.

UMass center Lari Ketner was an imposing defensive presence during a 57–49 win over the Temple Owls on Senior Day yesterday afternoon at the Mullins Center.

behind the PC cage before finding Sell all alone in front, who buried his 10th goal of the season.

"This was a huge win from the standpoint that we finished our homestand with a great crowd in a tight, exciting game," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "With this win we tied our number of Hockey East wins in a season and clinched a playoff spot. We also beat six of eight teams this year, which is a huge point for us."

UMass finished up the home portion of its schedule with an 8-6-1 record thanks to Saturday night's win. The support of a loyal following, especially the UMass students, has been appreciated by Mallen and the Minutemen all year long. So, after the final horn, Mallen publicly thanked the fans for their efforts.

"The students and the crowd have lifted us up all year. They've been such a spark for us at home," Mallen said. "It can't be understated that the kids here are catching on to hockey."

Said Helanen: "It [the crowd support] has been awesome. I've never seen anything like it. It's just an awesome feeling, and I think it's great to see."

The Minutemen are now tied for sixth place with UMass-Lowell with one game left to play. The regular season finale will take place Friday night at 7 p.m. against Merrimack at the Volpe Complex in North Andover. UMass has already beat the Warriors twice this season, with both games coming at home.

"It's going to be a big game for us. Merrimack has such as small barn, and it's going to be a physical game," Stork said. "I think it's going to be a challenge, but we should spank them pretty good."

Philadelphia]," Flint said of his squad's offense. "I thought we did another good job today attacking the zone. We just had to make some shots."

In addition to Mack, senior guard Charlton Clarke contributed to the dismantling of the Temple zone by driving to the hoop just often enough to help free up Mack. Junior forward Chris Kirkland was also the beneficiary of Clarke's passes, draining a number of outside shots en route to a 17-point, seven-rebound performance. Perhaps the most intriguing aspect of Clarke's accomplishment is the fact that he has been playing with a stress fracture in his foot.

As the captain and most intense competitor of his team, Clarke refused to sit out, and culminated his final home game with a win over UMass' largest rival.

"He got around on [his foot] pretty good today. He had to fight through it," Flint said of Clarke. "This is when courage comes into it. He's a warrior. He'll be alright."

Holding true to tradition, Flint started his four seniors against Temple. Although Ross Burns and Andy Maclay may have only played for a few seconds, they contributed to one of their team's finest efforts of the season. They also helped preserve Flint's unbeaten streak while coaching on Senior Day.

Boston College being the only UMass didn't take a point from this season[."

UMass was able to do this by winning five of their last seven games, and by winning four in a row at the Mullins Center. The latest win puts the Minutemen in a tie for sixth place in Hockey East with UMass-Lowell.

For the only dressed senior on Senior Night at the Mullins Center, Bryan Fitzgerald knew this was the best way he could go out, by winning and assisting on the final goal this season at the Mullins Center, which was scored by Nathan Sell.

"I had lots of nervousness before the game, being the only senior dressed. I really didn't think about it much. I didn't really get going until the third period," Fitzgerald said of playing in his final home game and getting an assist. "It was nice to get the assist, but I was struggling with the Providence defender and then all of the sudden he wasn't there anymore, and I saw a shirt out in front and just threw the puck out and Sell buried it."

Said Mallen: "It's interesting because Sellzy had a goal almost identical to that one in the Northeastern game. Fitzy made a great play out in front, and it's good to see him go out with a nice play like that in the last game of his career [at the Mullins Center]."

When the Minutemen gave their final tap of the season on the home ice Saturday night, thanking the home crowd for their support all season, the moment had to be a little more emotional for Fitzgerald.

Mallen then came across the ice and waved to the crowd of 3,089 and thanked them for their support, which drew a cheer out of the crowd. Following that gesture, Mallen went on the Mullins Center public address system and thanked the fans for their support on behalf of the 1998-1999 UMass squad.

"The students in the crowd have lifted us up. They have provided such a spark at home," Mallen said of the loyal UMass fans. "It can't be understated that the kids around here are really starting to catch on to hockey."

The last goal for the Minutemen is to move up as high as they can in the Hockey East tournament seedings. The Minutemen are currently tied for 6th with UMass-Lowell, with both teams having 16 points.

On the other hand, UMass is one point up on Merrimack right now. The remaining schedule includes UMass playing one game with Merrimack head-to-head, while the Warriors also had a date with Maine last night and will end the season at Boston College. Additionally, UMass-Lowell played New Hampshire last night, and finishes off the season at cellar-dweller Northeastern.

"Nothing is over. We still have a chance to move up the ladder. It's going to be a big game [Merrimack], so hopefully a lot of the fans will make trip," Helanen said.

Stats don't tell the story as UMass falls to Musketeers

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — Offensive rebounds? Advantage: Massachusetts, 22-9.
Total rebounds? Advantage: Massachusetts, 40-30.
Blocks? Massachusetts, 2-0.
Second half shooting percentage? Massachusetts, 429- 409.
Second half steals? Massachusetts, 4-2.
Final score? Xavier, 74-58.

In their matchup against the Musketeers in the second round of the Atlantic 10 Championship Tournament, the Massachusetts women's basketball team outranked its opponents in several statistical categories.

However, if a gambler had been in the stands for Saturday's loss, he would have bet otherwise.

Even though in certain numerical categories, the Minutewomen fared extremely well against their 20-win foes, it always seemed like they were being outplayed.

For every encouraging offensive rebound, there appeared to be at least one frustrating miss on a putback. For every fan-pleasing steal, there was at least one corresponding flat jump-shot on the offensive end.

"We didn't knock down the open shots that we had," UMass forward Tez Kraft said. "At the beginning of the first half it looked like we could do what we wanted to, but we just didn't do it."

When the final second ticked off the clock, Xavier came out victorious in a game during which UMass almost completely cancelled itself out.

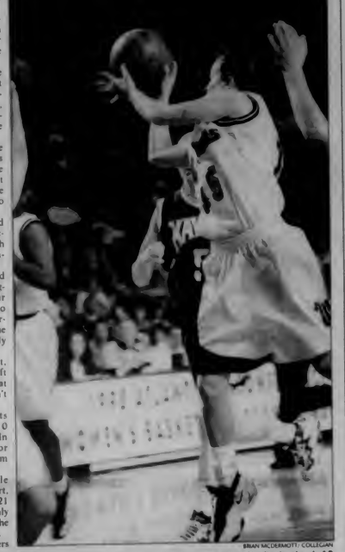
While the Musketeers rushed out of the opening gates like gangbusters, hungry to avenge their 49-44 semifinal loss to Massachusetts in last year's tourney, the Minutewomen spent the entire half searching desperately for their rhythm.

"I think when we first came out, we came out a little slow," Kraft said. "But we've been doing that the last couple of games. We can't figure out how to get out of it."

Out of the 32 first-half shots that UMass attempted, only 10 found the bottom of the net. In contrast, Xavier was good for nearly 60-percent shooting from the floor.

Musketeer guard Nicole Levandusky epitomized the effort, shooting 8-of-11 and scoring 21 points on the afternoon. Her only three misses were from behind the arc, where she was five-of-eight.

For Massachusetts, three players recorded at least five turnovers, including guard Alison MacFarland, who had seven against a lone assist.



Coincidentally, those three — MacFarland, guard Kathy Coyner and last year's tournament MVP Kraft — were the only Minutewomen to break double-digits, with 11, 12 and 12, respectively.

While UMass missed a lot of opportunities on their own, credit must be given to the relentless defense of the Musketeers.

"We did a lot of 3-2 [zone], and we covered all the cutters and didn't let them get any post plays," Xavier guard Nikki Kremer said of her team's defensive effort.

Overall, it probably seemed as though the scorecards lied to the truly dedicated UMass fans sitting in the Apollo of Temple in the wake of the loss — it just didn't add up. Although the Minutewomen matched the Musketeers 34-34 in the second half, they couldn't overcome their slow start.

In the end, Massachusetts' size on the stat sheet paled in comparison to the amount by which they were outplayed.

Non-call helps Friars record 3-2 victory over Minutemen

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE — The scenario that the Providence hockey team has dreaded as of late, once again came to the forefront on Friday night at Schneider Arena. This time around, however, the end result favored the host Friars.

Although the Massachusetts hockey team got a late goal from Randy Drohan, PC was able to sustain the UMass rush in a furious final two minutes to escape with a 3-2 win over the Minutemen.

"I didn't think that we played as well as we are capable of tonight," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "We had a lot of offensive attacks where we didn't even get a shot on goal, or where we would pass the puck. We just didn't execute the game plan as well as we are capable of."

The Friars have had problems holding onto leads late in the third period this season. Last weekend they gave up two goals in the final minute against Merrimack before winning in overtime, then folded late against Boston College on Tuesday night in a 5-5 tie.

After Mike Farrell scored with 11:09 to play in the game to make it 3-1, it appeared like that might be the sign for the Minutemen to start firing on all cylinders. Mallen eventually called a timeout with 4:31 to play, trying to get his team fired up for one last surge.

"I had personally seen them lose some late leads on scouting trips, so I told our guys to keep going," Mallen said. "We wanted to put more pressure on them and get the goalie out early."

The strategy paid off when Drohan's shot from the right point beat PC goalie Mark Kane to trim the lead to a goal with 1:22 remaining. UMass continued to keep the heat on the Friars late, but just couldn't notch the equalizer.

At first it seemed like the Minutemen might be in for a long night. Troy Lake lit the lamp only 1:27 into the game, but UMass came right back only 18 seconds later, as Jeff Turner snapped a shot between the legs of Kane to even the game. Turner had a goal and an assist on the evening despite playing at less than 100-percent.

"We almost lost him in the first period. He sat out about 10 minutes with a huge bruise above his kneecap, but he gutted it out," Mallen said. "The kid's a good player and he did his part tonight."

The turning point of the game, though, came midway through the opening period. Bryan Kennedy found R.J. Gates camped out in the slot, and the Plainville, Conn. product fired a shot over Kane and into the net. However, the bid ricocheted quickly off the inside of the net and back onto the ice. Neither the goal judge nor the referee signaled for a score, and the Friars dodged a huge bullet.

"I didn't hear anything as far as a clanging [of the post], but if they [his UMass players] thought it was in, then there probably would have been a lot more jumping up and down," Mallen said. "It's tough on a play like that because it goes in so quickly. You want to raise your stick up [to signify the goal] but you also want to stay in the play."

Providence took a 2-1 lead at 10:48 of the middle frame on a goal by J.J. Picinic. Markus Helanen appeared to cover up a loose puck just outside the crease, but Picinic came up with the disc and flipped one past the UMass netminder to give his team the lead.

Farrell then added the insurance goal in the third period, as he redirected home a point shot to give his team a two-goal lead.

"We've had a lot of weekends where we have a tough loss the first night but then come back and win the second night," Mallen said. "The good news about this loss is that we can come back in 24 hours and get another chance at beating them [PC]."

The Minutemen did in fact beat the Friars 3-1 the following night. For a complete wrap-up of that game, turn to page 10.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You can expect progress to be made more slowly than anticipated today. Then again, progress is progress, no matter how it comes. Enjoy your work.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may be relying on someone who is unable to give you everything you need at this time. You must be ready to look elsewhere for support.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You'll be assigned a task today that seems to be too difficult for you at first. However, a different perspective may show you the "way in."

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may feel as though you're in a "rut" of some kind, but the truth is that you're unconsciously holding yourself back for further assessment.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — This is a good day to apologize for something that in truth may have already been forgotten. Still, that's no reason not to say what you must.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may be too much to handle today, so be willing to turn to a Cancer native for the hands-on control you really need. Follow his or her example!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You want to be living more "on the edge" at this time, but what is a loved one going to say about that? You must be willing to compromise.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Something you've wanted to do for a long time is likely to be available to you before the day is out. Are you really ready for it?

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — What happens on the homefront today is sure to be more serious in the long run than you may think. You must do more than laugh it off.

You'll want to do things just a little differently today in order to prove to someone you love that you can do it. Challenge yourself!

UMass takes care of Temple

Minutemen get the job done on Senior Day

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Suddenly, the proverbial light at the end of the tunnel just got a little bit brighter for the Massachusetts men's basketball.

Not that yesterday's 57–49 win at the William D. Mullins Center over first–place Temple will mean much in the standings, but as far as this week's Atlantic 10 tournament is concerned, the victory could not have come at a better time.

The No. 24 ranked Owls (19–9, 13–3 A–10) entered the contest as winners of six of their last seven games. Their highly–touted match–up zone defense had intimidated conference foes all season long until yesterday.

The Minutemen (13–15, 9–7 A–10) abandoned their man–to–man defense in favor of a match–up zone of their own. The end result was poetic justice for UMass, who beat Temple at its own game.

"I guess we took a little page from they're book, trying to match up against everybody," Minuteman coach Bruiser Flint said of his defensive strategy. "Our goal was to handle their shooters and try to match up against them. Then we have to hope that they don't start hitting 40–footers."

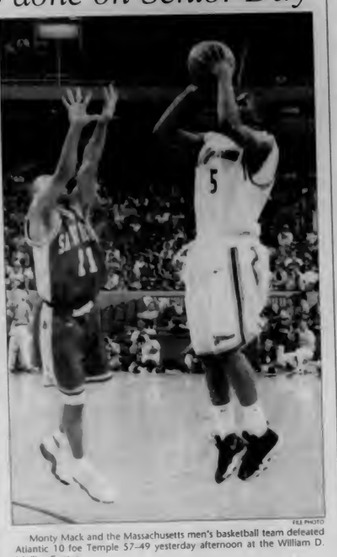
Flint's second–half plan worked to perfection. In fact, the Owls were nocturnal yesterday afternoon. After shooting a hot 46 percent from the floor in the opening frame, Temple followed with one of its most dismal halves of the season, connecting on only 5–of–29 shots.

Owl coach and match–up zone czar John Chaney had hoped his team could crack the tight Minuteman defense. Instead, he watched his starting guards Juan "Pepe" Sanchez and Rasheed Brokenborough score a combined eight points in comparison to 28 from the UMass starting backcourt.

"It's just a shame that we couldn't make baskets," Chaney said. "[With less than a minute left], we were within two possessions. Even then, we had two cracks at the basket. It's something you can do nothing about. You can call kinds of offensive changes and offensive sets, but when your team is missing close shots... I can't do anything about it."

With the win UMass wrapped up third place in the East Division of its conference and will meet Duquesne in the opening round of the tournament Wednesday at 2 p.m. in Philadelphia.

Part of the reason for the UMass success was the defensive effort of senior center Lari Ketner, who managed to send a strong message to the Temple front court. Usually foul–plagued, Ketner stayed out of foul trouble and created a defensive presence beneath the basket.



"[Lamont] Barnes only had four shots in the second half," Flint said of Ketner's presence in the paint. "I though Lari did a great job defensively against him and [Kevin] Lyde."

Although the Temple seemed stifled by the zone, the Minutemen thrived against it. UMass shot an impressive 42 percent against a defense which forces the opposing offense to live and die by the perimeter shot.

The hot start by Monty Mack helped his squad pull away and notch its first win over the Owls since the 1996–97 campaign. The junior guard finished with a game–high 18 points after connecting on five of his first six attempts — all of which came against the pressure match–up zone.

"I thought we attacked the zone great in the first game [in

Ketner comes up big in final home game

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Every player in Temple's front–court got a chance.

With 13:46 to go in the opening half of the Massachusetts men's basketball team's 57–49 victory over the Owls, Temple's reserve center Ronald Rullerson decided to get ambitious and post–up on UMass senior five–man, Lari Ketner.

It was Ketner's last game on the hardwood of the William D. Mullins Center, and the 6–foot–10–inch, 285 pounder was going to put his mark on Minuteman basketball once and for all. Rullerson was first in line to get the news.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Lari Ketner

The Owl backed up and muscled in a bit. He spun, stepped inside and went up with the ball. Ketner made a statement and swatted the shot away. The statement was simply that Rullerson had no business taking him on one–on– one.

Temple's starting center Kevin Lyde was next to challenge the big man. Lyde, a bit quicker than his backup, leaned in, juked and rolled to the hoop with two hands like coaches always tell young players to. The shot could not make it over Ketner, though, and the ball harmlessly hit the bottom of the rim.

"I just wanted to come out and make a strong defensive effort," Ketner said. "We just needed to make them take contested shots."

Okay, fair enough. How about forward Lamont Barnes? He had scored 23 points in the Owls' dismantling of Fordham on Wednesday, and with 5:56 left before halftime, he would try to dethrone Ketner. Barnes drove his shoulder into the maroon No. 4 stitched on the Minuteman center's jersey and attempted a fall–away jumper. The roundball didn't even hit the rim as the Temple forward was forced to arc his attempt over the long arm of Ketner.

Roughly two minutes later, Barnes got another chance. The Owls All–Atlantic 10 candidate took a dump–off pass alone on the right baseline a few feet from the basket. He up–faked, and went up strong. Out of nowhere, Ketner came to position himself in front of the opposite man and ended the chaos with his open fist. Block number two.

Throughout the contest, UMass' senior center continued to single–handedly prevent Temple from making any progress underneath. Though he managed to score only eight points in his final time out on his home court, Ketner became a presence inside by successfully doing all the intangible things that make a player great.

"He was a presence out there," UMass coach Bruiser Flint. "He blocked shots and went and got balls when we needed it. He was a presence."

After dealing with a lifetime's worth of criticism in his last year in a Massachusetts uniform for apparently falling short of the lofty expectations set for him by those at the press tables, Ketner has quietly maintained his stature in paint. Nine times during this tumultuous season, the over– analyzed post–man recorded a double–double while dealing exclusively with double and triple teams, and he has consistently stayed amongst the top 10 in the conference in rebounds and blocks — sixth and second, currently.

Xavier crushes Minutewomen in A–10 quarterfinals

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The Massachusetts women's basketball team saved its worst for last, falling 74–58 to Xavier in the quarterfinals of the Atlantic 10 tournament on Saturday at the Apollo of Temple.

The loss drops the Minutewomen to 16–14 overall, 11–6 in the A–10, and all but eliminates hopes of further post–season play.

An invitation to the National Invitation Tournament (NIT) remains a possibility, but as of now Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien does not want to speculate on the issue.

"I haven't thought about our chances for the NIT," O'Brien said. "That's not something I know about right now."

After the Musketeers (22–7, 12–5 in A–10) handily defeated Rhode Island on Friday, UMass prepared for a Xavier team that had not only beat them previously this year, but clearly had revenge on their minds from last season.

"They ruined our chance to play in the NCAA's last year by beating us in the A–10's," Xavier guard Nicole Levandusky said. "We wanted to get a chance to knock them out this time."

Levandusky did her part to atone for last year's 49–44 UMass win in the quarterfinals of the A–10 tourney. She led the way for Xavier with a game–high 21 points, including 5–of–8 three–point shooting, while dishing out four assists.

Both teams had to wait an additional 30 minutes to take the floor as Virginia Tech needed three overtimes to win a thrilling quarterfinal matchup over Dayton, leading to questions about the lingering effects the holdover had on the UMass and Xavier players.

"Having to wait that extra time to play may have hurt us a little early on," UMass guard Alison MacFarland said. "But we should be ready to play no matter what, so it would be silly to use that as an excuse for losing."

The game began in ominous fashion for UMass, as freshman center Nekole Smith, who has been excellent in the post, missed two open layups after winning the opening tap.

Smith picked up her third foul with 6:42 remaining in the first half, and was not able to get into her usual rhythm thereafter.

Smith was not the only player suffering from tournament jitters, as senior tri–captain Tez Kraft was whistled for two early traveling violations.

The contest was never close after Xavier jumped out to a 15–8 lead on a trifecta from Katie Griggs off a Nikki Kremer (10 assists) feed.

UMass closed the deficit to five at 21–16, before Xavier reeled off a devastating 17–5 outburst that left the Minutewomen trailing 38–21 with 2:19 to go before halftime.

After that run, Caroline Nehls ran off three straight points for UMass, the latter two on a layup after a swift past from Yolanda Rayside into the paint.

However, Taru Tuukkanen put the finishing touches on the Musketeers' first half attack by answering Nehls with a layup of her own after a drive into the lane for a 40–24 halftime advantage.

The Minutewomen shot only 10–for–32 (32 percent) from the field before the break, compared to the sharp–shooting Musketeers who were 16–for–27 (59 percent).

UMass won the battle on the boards in the frame 19–16, including 11 on the offensive glass, but they were mainly unable to convert those rebounds into points.

The second half began much like the first, as the Minutewomen failed to convert on four shot opportunities, before Jennifer Phillips scored in transition going the other way.

UMass was able to minimally chip away at the lead, as they closed to within 60–49 with 5:04 to play after Kathy Coyner and MacFarland scored in succession.

Down 62–49, Coyner missed an open layup which led to Levendusky hammering down the nail in the coffin with her fifth three–pointer on the day for a 65–49 Xavier stronghold.

"This was a situation where we had our opportunities," O'Brien said. "We simply could not get the ball to go down on a lot of put–backs, and moreover Xavier is a very good team that played very well."

Kraft, who may have played her last game for the Minutewomen, conceded that the NIT would be of interest to her.

"I'm not ready to leave this team just yet," Kraft said. "It would be great if we get a chance to play a couple of more games."

Minutewomen Notes: Kraft was named to the Second Team All–Conference, and Smith was selected for the All– Rookie team.

Minutemen qualify for Hockey East playoffs

PROVIDENCE — The Massachusetts hockey team has done it.

The Minutemen clinched a Hockey East playoff berth on Saturday with a 3–1 win over Providence College at the William D. Mullins Center. The win came in the second half of a home and home series with the Friars.

Paul Teves

The win was another huge one for UMass, as once again the Minutemen won a must–win game on Saturday after losing one on Friday night to the same Friars squad.

The Minutemen were tied 1–1 with the Friars on Friday night when Bryan Kennedy made a great pass to R.J. Gates who seemingly buried the go–ahead goal. However, neither the official nor the goal judge agreed, but the puck clearly crossed the line. UMass would eventually lose by a goal, but that makes the accomplishments of the Minutemen on Saturday night all the more impressive.

"I didn't hear a clang off the post, but had it gone in I think there would have been more jumping up and down from our guys," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said of the goal that wasn't. "Instinct tells you to throw your stick up when it goes in, but you still want to keep playing if it's not a goal. But I think we didn't play as well as we are capable of playing."

But the story for the Minutemen is that they will return to the Hockey East playoffs after a one year absence.

"Huge win tonight. It was a great crowd, and it was a tight game and exciting game. We tied the number of Hockey East wins ever in a season with seven, and we clinched a Hockey East playoff berth," Mallen said. "One of the most important things that we have done this season is that we beat six of the eight teams in Hockey East [New Hampshire and

Minutemen make playoffs with 3-1 win over Friars

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

After dropping a 3–2 decision on Friday night against Providence College, the Massachusetts hockey team went back to its bread and butter on Saturday night in the back end of a home and home series with the Friars.

The Minutemen came out with a renewed sense of purpose for Saturday's game at the William D. Mullins Center, knowing that a win would secure a berth in the Hockey East playoffs.

Offensively, UMass (11–19–2, 7–14–2 in Hockey East) got a pair of first period goals from freshmen Jedd Crumb and Martin Miljko and an insurance goal from Nathan Sell, while defensively, the play of sophomore goaltender Markus Helanen and the UMass blueliners gave PC fits all night in a 3–1 win over the Friars.

"The biggest thing about tonight was that we just frustrated them with our trap," UMass junior captain Deim Stork said. "Last night I didn't think that we were ready to play, but tonight we knew that this is our barn and that we had to set the tempo right off the bat. We got some big goals from Jedd Crumb and Martin Miljko, and that lifted us right up."

The Minutemen jumped out to a 1–0 lead at the 15:35 mark of the first period on a goal by the aforementioned Crumb. Freshman forward Darcy King outraced two PC defenders to a loose puck in the Friars end and fed Crumb, who was stationed all alone in the slot. The Winnipeg, Manitoba product then rocked a shot over Boyd Ballard for his second goal of the season.

UMass then doubled its lead only 34 seconds later on a goal by Miljko. The freshman winger gloved down a Providence clearing attempt in the neutral zone, gained the PC blue line and fired a slap shot under Ballard's right shoulder for a 2–0 advantage.

The score stayed that way until midway through the third period. Friars defenseman Josh MacNevin let loose a slap shot from just outside the UMass zone that fooled Helanen. The disc seemed to deflect off the paddle of his goal stick before hopping over the goal line. It was the only blemish on what was otherwise another excellent outing from the Finnish native.

"It all started earlier today. I had a meeting with Coach [Mallen] and he wanted to know why I wasn't sharp last night," Helanen said. "I think I had a good game tonight. I was just trying to keep it simple, and I think I did that."

Sell, the team leader in goals, then put the game away just about two minutes after MacNevin's goal. Senior alternate captain Bryan Fitzgerald, who was playing his final home game at the Mullins Center, set the play up by winning the battle for a loose puck

UM police prevent suicide, attempted murder in dorm

By Stacey Shackford and Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Police, responding to a report of a disturbance in Brown Residence Hall Sunday morning, ended up rescuing an individual who attempted to commit suicide after nearly strangling his girlfriend.

According to Barbara O'Connor, deputy chief of the University of Massachusetts Police Department, police arrived on the scene at 6:39 a.m. They were met by housing staff and directed to the fifth floor.

The officers observed a crying female with scratches on her face enter the elevator. They then heard yelling, and observed two males struggling on the floor of a fifth–floor room.

One male, later identified as Francisco Rivera, freed himself and attempted to dive through the window. The window shattered and the police grabbed Rivera's torso as he dangled, more than three quarters out the window. Rivera continued to struggle and attempted to jump.

"There is no question that the officers prevented him from falling to his death," O'Conner said.

When the officers finally pulled him back into the room, Rivera was handcuffed and taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital, where he was treated for lacerations to his face and torso.

The police continued the investigation and discovered Rivera had participated in an altercation with his girlfriend previous to his suicide attempt.

According to O'Conner, Rivera and his girlfriend had engaged in a domestic dispute, and Rivera grabbed his girlfriend around her neck, holding her in the room for hours against her will. The victim screamed throughout the assault, but no one called the police until 6:30 a.m.

The RA on duty that morning was the first individual to be alerted to the altercation and made the emergency call to police.

"I heard yelling and crashing and that's when I called the police," she said.

As far as she knows, she was the only individual in the building to make an emergency call to the UMass Police, a fact that has concerned many Residence Life staff members in the Sylvan Residence Area.

"We're concerned as to the reason no one else in the building called the police," she said. "One witness said she could hear the noise as far as the basement."

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Brown Residence Hall, the site of a recent assault.

But one third–floor resident said she didn't think anything was wrong at the time.

"I just heard her screaming at first," she said. "When I woke up again, a guy was screaming something about how much she didn't love him. I thought she was getting raped because she kept yelling... It was a little scary."

When Rivera finally released his girlfriend, he ran into another room in the suite and attempted to jump out the window, saying he had no reason to live. His friend entered the room, trying to calm Rivera down, and eventually wrestled him to the floor to prevent him from jumping.

An individual next to the suite Rivera was in said he awoke to the sound of what he believed were people partying.

"I thought people were still partying," he said. "But then I heard a window smash and the guy was yelling he was going to jump."

O'Conner said alcohol was a factor in the incident; neither Rivera nor his friend were UMass students.

"I don't know how much [alcohol] he had," the RA on duty said. "This is the first type of conflict between these two individuals as far as I know."

Rivera was later arrested and charged with attempted murder, domestic assault and battery, disruptive conduct, and destruction of property. He will appear in Hampshire County District Court today for arraignment.

Baker fire origin still unknown

A fire of suspicious origins broke out in Baker Residence Hall at the University of Massachusetts at approximately 5 a.m. Saturday morning.

The Amherst Fire Department, UMass Police, Environmental Health and Safety and the State Fire Marshall, responded to a fire that started in a plastic trash bin and spread from the outside, into the basement of the residence hall. The estimated cost in damage has not been determined at this point.

"Aside from the inconvenience and bad odor, the fire was kept to the location of origin," Amherst Fire Department Captain Alan Tower said.

Fire Department crew responded to the scene subsequently after smoke had risen from the basement of Baker into the prevailing open windows of residents' rooms, causing the fire alarm to go off.

"No one is going to say whether it [the fire] was accidental or intentional," Tower stated.

Tower says the fire is of a suspicious nature because there is no indication of what started the fire, but have confirmed four plastic trash bins had been the source of origin.

There was no indication of any individuals harmed by the fire, Tower said. The fire is still under investigation by the State Fire Marshall and the Amherst Fire Department.

According to Tower, the cause of the fire may remain undetermined. Investigators aren't ruling out the possibility of arson at this time. If anyone has further information regarding the fires, please call the Amherst Fire Department at 256–4082.

Amherst man pleads not guilty in Brandywine invasion case

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

An Amherst man pled not guilty Friday to charges of armed robbery and the home invasion of a student residence at Brandywine Apartments in December.

Members of the Amherst Police Department travelled to Florida to apprehend Danny Clemons, 20, of 188 East Hadley Rd., who was arrested on charges of home invasion and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon. He was arrested in Jacksonville, Fla., on Feb. 16 on an Amherst warrant after his vehicle was stopped for a vehicle violation.

He is currently being held without bail pending a dangerousness hearing, which is scheduled to take place today at Hampshire County District Court.

According to court documents, Clemons and two others forced entry into the Brandywine apartment at approximately 10 p.m. on Dec. 22 while masked and armed with handguns, demanding drugs and money. Six University of Massachusetts students were gathered inside the apartment for a small post–finals party.

The three intruders ordered the students to lay on the floor while yelling, "Where's the bud? Where's the money?"

They tied the hands of two of the students and patted down all of the victims for personal items, taking several wallets and cash.

The intruders were all wearing "Scream" and "Jason" masks and clothing that covered their entire bodies, not exposing any skin.

They continued to ask where drugs and money were kept, and Erik Dowling volunteered that he lived in the apartment and would assist them with locating items. He was taken at gunpoint into the lone bedroom of the apartment and forced to lie face down on the bed. He was then moved to the bathroom, where he laid down on the floor in the dark of the room with the door closed as one of the intruders held a gun to his head.

After a short period of time, the intruder left. According to reports from the other students who remained in the living room, there was a knock at the door, at which point the intruders became nervous. One of the intruders told the person at the door to go away; after awhile there were more knocks on the door.

The intruders then flung the door open and burst out. dis-

Men banned from campus after lewd, lascivious acts

James D. Timmins, 19, of 14 Toria Heights Rd., Oxford, was arrested Sunday morning at James Residence Hall and charged with lewd, wanton and lascivious conduct and assault.

Timmins was released on $100 bail, and pled not guilty during his arraignment hearing yesterday at Hampshire County District Court.

According to the victim, a resident assistant (RA) in the all–female dormitory, there was no campus security on duty when Timmins, a non–resident, "darted into the building." The RA said Timmins and another male were visiting a resident of the building, but were intoxicated and being disruptive. She asked them to leave three times, calling the police at one point for assistance.

As the RA was escorting the two men out of the building at approximately 3 a.m., she asked them for identification, at which point Timmins said, "You want ID? I'll show you my ID," and exposed and fondled his penis while walking towards her.

According to court documents, he then threatened to put his penis in her mouth while calling her a slew of derogatory obscenities. Fearing for her personal safety, the RA started screaming for help, and the two men left the building.

Timmins was trespassed from the University and ordered to stay away from the victim. He will be returning to court for a pre–trial hearing on April 8.

Nutritionist: Unhealthy images hurt women

By Elsa Allen
Collegian Staff

Studies done by a national organization on bulimia and anorexia suggest that these two diseases strike one million Americans each year. Of these one million Americans, 90–95 percent are women.

See related stories and info, pg. 5

While speaking with Arleen Thomson, R.D., a nutritionist at University Health Services, a glossy women's magazine was laying on the table. The woman on the cover did not fit today's stereotypical model criteria. She did not look emaciated. Her eyes were not sunken, her arms were not spindly. She smiled, producing round cheeks, a full chin and a healthy glow. Thomson noted, flipping through the pages, that the women in this magazine do not look fat, but healthy.

Mode magazine, targeted toward women sizes 12 and up, promotes "style beyond size." It is just one example of how today's society is beginning to confront problems concerning diet, weight loss and body image — especially in the case of women.

Thomson believes women's fashion magazines featuring ultra–thin models are creating unrealistic standards in the impressionable minds of young girls. She said increasingly younger girls are seeking help for eating disorders, suggesting the problem may lie in the media that targets these children.

A recent South Carolina study of 13,000 school children reported 15 percent had starved themselves or forced bulimic behaviors in order to lose weight.

"It's really horrible when you think that 10 and 11–year– old girls are reading these magazines and creating images for themselves," said Thomson.

According to statistics provided by Thomson, a generation ago the average model weighed 8 percent less than the average American woman. Today the average model weighs 23 percent less.

In the 13 years she has worked as a nutritionist at UMass, Thomson has seen a significant rise in the number of people who suffer from eating disorders.

According to Thomson, approximately 20 percent of college women suffer from eating disorders, with a significantly higher incidence among college female athletes.

"An eating disorder is a psychological disease," said Thomson. "Food is the symptom, not the problem. Food is the way [a person] deals with psychological problems."

Eating disorders including anorexia, bulimia and compulsive overeating can result in many psychological and physical problems. Psychological symptoms may include low self–esteem, depression, isolation, distorted body image, a secretive lifestyle and an obsession with food, weight, physical appearance and control.

Physical symptoms can include circulatory problems, low blood pressure, irregular menstruation in women, abdominal pain, constipation and digestive problems.

If you believe that you or someone you know has an eating disorder, Thomson said, it is important that help is sought quickly.

"The longer someone has been entrenched [with the disorder] the longer recovery takes. That is why we encourage people to get in as soon as they realize [they might have a problem.]" Thomson said.

Often, she notes, people will come in seeking help for their roommates, especially in cases of bulimia.

There are many things a person can do to help a friend they believe has an eating disorder. When confronting someone, Thomson stresses the importance of being direct without attacking the person.

"People with eating disorders tend to be very embarrassed," Thomson said. "It is important to use 'I' statements when offering help. They already feel shamed by their illness, it's important not to make them feel worse."

"Understand," Thomson said of those trying to help, "that you're not responsible for them. You can only

Activist Braden to talk about personal struggle

Writer, editor and civil rights activist Anne Braden will speak on her experiences in a lecture entitled "Five Decades of Struggle for Racial, Economic and Social Justice: Where Have We Been and Where Are We Going." The free lecture held at Memorial Hall tomorrow will begin at 4 p.m.

Braden, who has spent the past 50 years working for the civil rights movement, currently co–chairs the Southern Organizing Committee for Economic and Social Justice. She is also a leader in the Kentucky Alliance Against Racist and Political Repression and the Kentucky Rainbow Coalition.

Braden and her husband were charged with sedition against the state of Kentucky in the early 1950s after they purchased a home in the "white" section of town. then sold the home to an African–American family.

Her book, "The Wall Between," published in 1958, details the criminal charges brought against the Bradens and its effect on their lives, and will be reissued by the University of Tennessee Press.

The lecture is one in a five–day series of events including a lecture on Thursday at Smith College's Wright Hall, from 4–6 p.m. She will be discussing the role of women in the social justice movements for the last 50 years. Also, on March 6, Braden will speak at a "Not In Our Town" pot luck lunch at 16 Spring St. In Amherst at 12:30 p.m.

The series is hosted by the Ad Hoc Committee to Bring Anne Braden to the Valley.

Committee member Arlene Avakian, a University of Massachusetts women's studies professor, says she hopes that Braden "will inspire us in our political and intellectual work to make a better world... Combining a brilliant political mind with a lifetime of activism against injustice, Anne Braden's insights are needed more than ever at this time of ever increasing social inequality."

covering three more students who had arrived to attend the party. One of the students, was pushed back by the first intruder out the door, who pointed a gun and struck him on the forehead with it. The three intruders then fled the scene, one running down the back stairs and the other two down the front stairs.

The victim ran to another apartment with face and head wounds to report that he had been assaulted. The owner of the apartment called the police to report the incident.

Meanwhile, Dowling remained in the bathroom until his girlfriend came in and told him all of the intruders had gone, at which point he returned to the living room and united his friends. The group continued to lie on the floor for awhile before gathering the nerve to get up and decide what to do.

Officer C. Nelson of the Amherst Police Department arrived on the scene and discovered 6–8 individuals inside the apartment, all of whom appeared to be frightened by what had taken place. The students were taken to the Amherst police station and police began investigating the crime.

Another individual arrived at the police station the next day with information about the identities of the intruders. With the help of the informant, victim testimony and evidence collected at the scene of the crime, three suspects were identified including Montrell Parker and Danny Clemons.

Parker was called in to the Amherst Police Department for questioning; after initially denying the allegations, he finally admitted he had participated in the crime. Parker, 22, had been fired from the Bluewall Cafe just days earlier, and said he had entered the apartment with the intention of stealing drugs. When asked why he did it, he responded, "Cocaine, I use cocaine."

Parker said he used a .357 caliber Ruger handgun that he had stolen from "some Asian kid" a month earlier, but assured the officers he had taken the bullets out because he did not want to accidentally kill anyone. After the fleeing the scene, he caught a bus to go home and has not talked to the other suspects since, he said.

He was arrested on Dec. 28 and charged with one count of home invasion while armed using dangerous force, three counts of armed robbery while masked or disguised, four counts of assault with intent to rob, and two counts of assault and battery by means of a dangerous weapon.

He was indicted and arraigned in Hampshire County Superior Court on Feb. 5, and is currently being held at the Hampshire House of Corrections on $2,500 bail. He has entered a plea of not guilty and will reappear in Superior Court for a status hearing on March 31.

Clemons' fate may be determined at today's dangerousness hearing. This is not his first offense — he appeared in the same courthouse in October of last year for multiple counts of criminal and civil motor vehicle violations. He also appeared in district court in August 1996 for an illegal drug operation; he pled guilty to possession of a Class B substance, crack cocaine, and possession of a Class D substance, marijuana, with intent to distribute, manufacture and cultivate.

The third suspect is still at large.

Higher ed standards show results

By Anjetta McQueen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The federal program for poor and other disadvantaged children has encouraged higher standards in schools and thus helped to increase learning, the Education Department says in a new report.

But critics say the federal program is hindering state reform and have called for its overhaul.

In its first study of the $8 billion Title I program, the department concluded yesterday that, by encouraging higher state standards, the program had closed some of the learning gaps between rich and poor children.

"We have evidence of improving achievement in urban school districts enrolling significant numbers of poor and minority children," Education Secretary Richard Riley recently told a congressional panel.

The law was changed in 1994 to require states to apply high academic standards to schools and students participating in Title I programs. And schools with 50 percent poor students can use the money on all students, rather than providing extra help to a limited number of students.

However, a group of education scholars and state officials released a report last week contending that federal education programs, including Title I, which date back to the 1960s, have hindered significant school reform at the local level.

"Congress should consider a major overhaul of the federal role in K-12 education," said Chester E. Finn, Jr., an education official under President Reagan and president of the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, which released the report. The group is not affiliated with Fordham University.

"This is not the time for tweaking," said Finn, who urged Congress to consider fresh approaches as it prepares to renew the nation's major education laws this year.

For example, Diane Ravitch, a former assistant secretary of education in the Bush administration, calls for an overhaul of Title I, turning it into a "portable entitlement," meaning that federal money would follow poor children to the schools they choose.

Other critics, such as Lisa Graham Keegan, Arizona's superintendent of public instruction, said the federal programs were too restrictive for the states.

"It is time to stop insisting that our representatives in Washington figure out what to do about education," Keegan said. "We'll figure it out for them."

The Education Department's report says states that have followed the standards found in the federal program generally show increased achievement levels in high-poverty schools.

Individual states have made notable progress very quickly. Riley told Congress. For example, North Carolina more than doubled the percentage of its eighth-graders scoring at the proficient or advanced levels on a national math test, from 9 percent in 1990 to 20 percent in 1996.

Also yesterday, a research arm of the Education Department reported that 51 percent of the nation's instructional rooms in schools — either classrooms, computer labs or school libraries — are hooked up to the Internet.

That figure for 1998 was up from 27 percent in 1997, according to the National Center for Education Statistics. In 1994, just 3 percent of such rooms had Internet access.

With his legal web untangled, Spider–Man hits big screen

By Michael Fleeman
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — After spending years snared in a complicated legal web, the comic book superhero Spider-Man is now free to star in his first feature film, the result of a Superior Court settlement announced yesterday.

On the week trial was set to begin, Sony Pictures Entertainment and comic book publisher Marvel Enterprises Inc. signed an agreement to launch a movie franchise featuring one of the most prized characters never to appear on film.

"We couldn't be happier — at long last — to bring this popular character to the big screen to the delight of audience around the world," said Amy Pascal, president of Sony's Columbia Pictures. There was no announcement on when a movie project would begin. Aside from agreeing to drop all claims and make the movie, none of the terms of the settlement were released.

The Spider-Man character was created by famed Marvel comic book artist Stan Lee in 1962, entering the world as "The Amazing Spider-Man." Spider-Man is really teen-ager Peter Parker, who got his powers when bitten by a radioactive spider.

Spider-Man comics have been huge sellers, and the hero has been the basis of a newspaper comic strip and animated and live-action TV series — but never a feature film.

For years, studios have been eager to make a Spider-Man movie to share in some of the success of the Batman and Superman films. At one point, "Titanic" director James Cameron had been recruited to write and direct a Spider-Man film.

But Spider-Man has been kept off the screen because of more than a decade of business problems, including bankruptcies of at least three companies linked to the character and competing claims in court to the rights.

The years of lawsuits and counter-lawsuits before Superior Court Judge Aurelio Munoz have generated 60 boxes of court documents. The settlement resolves competing lawsuits by Marvel and Sony. It also settles claims by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, which had contended it had acquired the rights from a number of now-defunct film companies.

Last month, MGM suffered a setback when a judge rejected those claims. MGM had said it would appeal. An MGM spokesman declined to comment other than to confirm MGM had resolved its disputes in the matter.

The settlement doesn't affect claims by yet another litigant, Viacom Inc., which are still scheduled for trial this week. Viacom contends it holds the television distribution rights to any Spider-Man movie. Viacom officials didn't return a message seeking comment.

The settlement was a major boost for Marvel Enterprises, which also is involved in licensing and toys. The company was formed last October after Marvel Entertainment Group emerged from bankruptcy and combined with Toy Biz Inc.

Benefits are not enough to promote circumcision

By Eric Fidler
Associated Press

CHICAGO — The nation's most influential group of pediatricians has concluded that the benefits of circumcising newborns aren't significant enough to recommend it as a routine procedure.

The American Academy of Pediatrics stopped short of advising against circumcision. But the group recommended for the first time yesterday that newborns get pain relief for it.

"The weight of the evidence would have to be significant for the academy to recommend an elective surgical procedure on every newborn male, and the evidence is not sufficient for us to make such a recommendation," said Dr. Carole Lannon, chairwoman of the task force that wrote the new policy statement for the academy, which has 55,000 members.

Over the last 15 years or so, a grassroots anti-circumcision movement and debate in the medical community have stirred new doubt and discussion about the procedure, with opponents saying it leaves long-term psychological scars and diminishes sexual pleasure.

"I think what that means is the medical debate is over," said Ronald Goldman, director of the Circumcision Resource Center, an anti-circumcision organization. "I think circumcision is now an ethical issue. It challenges us to empathize with newborn infants."

Just how many newborns are circumcised annually is unclear. Federal figures show that nearly two-thirds of American boys born in 1995 were circumcised, but the pediatrics academy said those statistics were taken from too small a sample to be reliable. The new policy statement, outlined in a report in the March issue of Pediatrics, the academy's journal, says parents should take into account cultural and religious traditions as well as the advice of a pediatrician when considering circumcision.

In its last policy statement on the issue, in 1989, the academy said circumcision has potential medical benefits as well as risks and should be carefully explained to parents.

After reviewing scientific evidence, the task force did find some medical benefits of circumcision:

• —Boys who have not been circumcised are as much as 12 times more likely to get urinary tract infections than those who have been circumcised. Uncircumcised boys had a 1-in-100 chance of developing such an infection in their first year of life; for circumcised boys the chance was 1 in 1,000.

• Some evidence shows penile cancer is more prevalent among uncircumcised males. But the disease is so rare, striking just 1 in 100,000 American males a year, that the researchers found any added risk insignificant.

The academy's report said pain relief is recommended because studies have shown that infants circumcised without anesthesia experience pain and bodily stress.

The task force reviewed three forms of pain relief. One involves applying a local anesthetic in a cream about an hour before the procedure. The two others involve injecting anesthetics into the penis. One of those, a subcutaneous ring block, was deemed the most effective.

Rabbi Gerald Chirnomas of Boonton, N.J., who estimates he has performed 12,000 circumcisions, said that anesthesia is unnecessary and that injections are more painful than the circumcision. He allows an infant to suck a little wine from his finger, then gives him some sugar water from a bottle after the circumcision for pain relief.

First democratic vote in years riddled with scandal in Nigeria

By Tim Sullivan
Associated Press

ABUJA, Nigeria — A retired general who 20 years ago stepped down as the head of a military junta was declared the winner yesterday of Nigeria's presidential elections amid widespread allegations of fraud.

The election won by former Gen. Olusegun Obasanjo (o-LOO-she-gun o-BA-SAN-jo) had been billed as the final step in a return to democracy for Africa's most populous country.

But election monitors from the United States found flaws in the electoral process, including inflated vote returns, ballot box stuffing and altered results.

"What happened on Saturday was a farce, a charade," declared former Finance Minister Olu Falae, Obasanjo's defeated opponent. "The degree of fraud was so monumental as to make nonsense of the entire process."

Former President Carter, who led a delegation of observers, told Nigerian election officials that fraud was so widespread it was impossible to judge whether the results were accurate in the first election in 15 years.

Local observers were even harsher in their assessment. Nigeria's Transition Monitoring Group said parties backing both candidates were guilty of cheating and that electoral officers "colluded across the country" to falsify results.

Nigeria has never held a presidential election in which the loser accepted defeat. In both previous presidential elections, in 1979 and 1993, the apparent result was contested by at least one of the candidates.

Obasanjo admitted to irregularities, but said they were committed by "ignorant" people, and should not influence opinions about the results.

"I don't believe there is anywhere in the world where elections are conducted by human beings that are perfect. And Nigeria would not be an exception," Obasanjo said.

Obasanjo had captured 63 percent of the vote, while Falae took 37 percent, Nigerian election officials said yesterday. About 30 million votes were cast.

The debate is now turning to whether the questions of fraud will overshadow Obasanjo's four-year tenure, which begins May 29 when Nigeria's current military leader, Gen. Abdulsalami Abubakar, steps down.

Falae called on Nigerians to take to the streets.

"Millions of Nigerians who voted for us have a duty to show their dissatisfaction by protesting against the government," he said.

There were no immediate signs of public anger. Streets were calm in Nigeria's southwest, which voted overwhelmingly for Falae and has long been the center of Nigeria's democracy movement.

Many southwesterners are deeply suspicious of Obasanjo's military ties — even though he gave up his position as junta leader in 1979, handing over power to a civilian government and was a political prisoner during the rule of former dictator Gen. Sani Abacha.

The military refused to publicly take sides in the election, but army generals financed Obasanjo's campaign and created a powerful political machine that overwhelmed Falae.

Obasanjo pledged to nurture democracy. In doing so, he faces enormous challenges.

Corruption and mismanagement have hobbled a nation that is awash in oil wealth, leaving much of its infrastructure crumbling — without proper electricity, water and phone service.

While most the nation remains mired in poverty, a small coterie of soldiers, politicians and businessmen close to the junta have skimmed billions of dollars from the treasury.

Obasanjo has said he will establish a tribunal to investigate even though he also promised not to conduct a purge of the — military, who are among the main culprits.

Change began in Nigeria in June, when Abacha's brutal five-year dictatorship came to an end with his sudden death, leading the way for Abubakar to launch the democratic transition program.

For some Nigerians, the results meant that military rule was finally over.

"It is the end of the rule of the generals," said Lawal Isyaku, 30.

But Lagos school teacher Dele Adeniyi saw no reason to be happy. "His success in the election is the success of the military," he said as he waited for a bus. "Why should civilians celebrate it?"

Men need not apply

It's the beginning of the semester, and you are attempting to get into a class that interests you very much. Taking your seat, you smile as you hear the professor say that she will likely be able to add to the class most of the unregistered people.

However, just as you reach for the syllabus that is being passed around, the professor addresses you. She says that you must leave the room because you are a man.

Jason Weisenbach

This is the situation Duane Naquin, a student at co-ed Boston College, currently faces. The professor of the feminist ethics class he wants to take, Mary Daly, refuses to allow men into any of her classes.

Naquin has claimed discrimination to the administration, and now has the backing of the Center for Individual Rights law firm. This conservative firm's lawsuit effectively ended the University of Texas's affirmative action policy.

Daly is a highly respected feminist and refused the demand that Naquin be permitted into her class. Instead, she took a leave of absence this semester.

Daly claims that allowing men to attend her classes would fundamentally alter her teaching. In the past, she has surmised that "even if there were only one or two men with 20 women, the young women would be constantly on an overt or a subliminal level giving their attention to the men because they've been socialized to nurse men."

"I would have felt highly insulted if my schedule said, 'ineligible — no males allowed.'"

Daly's claim here is not without merit. No one can deny that men and women are not equal in this country. Women of all races earn less money than their male counterparts of the same race. Furthermore, the "glass ceiling" that prevents women from reaching the highest executive positions, such as CEO and President of the United States, still exists.

Most notably, though, is that women are not just culturally considered lesser than their male counterparts, but legally they are as well. The Equal Rights Amendment has never been passed, and until it is, women and men will be unequal citizens in this country in law as well as culture.

Despite the fact that Daly is correct in asserting that males' culturally superior position could affect her class structure, she is an employee of a business: Boston College. Boston College officials say that Daly's ground rules violate federal civil rights laws and school policy.

The college is a co-educational institution, which means that all academic classes are open to anyone that wishes to enroll. If the school policy is that women-only classes cannot be continued, then Daly must discontinue having them. She is an employee of a business, and like any employee at a business, she cannot be permitted to break its rules simply for personal preference.

Daly, however, claims that the reason she could not admit the student is because he had not met the prerequisite requirements of taking another feminist course before her own. We know very well, though, that prerequisites are often ignored if the professor believes a student can handle the knowledge missed by skipping the previous course.

Despite this claim, though, which may or may not be true, it is clear that Daly has instituted a women-only policy for her courses. Therefore, the male student has the right to dispute her policy, as does the school itself.

I take this issue on a personal level as well, for I myself have enrolled in a theoretical course in women's studies this semester. I would have felt highly insulted if my schedule said, "ineligible — no males allowed." How absurd does this sound?

The main reason I chose the class is because I firmly believe in egalitarian practices, no matter what the circumstances. I would not have even tried to enter the class if I did not, and I feel most people who enroll in a class such as this have the same desire for equality that I do.

Therefore, I feel the BC male student is likely another male who believes in women's rights. To be rejected is a message to him that not only do the men in power in this country hold onto gender inequalities, but that some women would rather sacrifice male knowledge for female knowledge of gender differences.

This method of constructing courses ignores half of the population. It suggests that the only way to equality is to teach an oppressed group to respect themselves as equals. This is certainly necessary, but equality cannot be achieved if only half of the population is aware of the deeply rooted gender differences in this country.

When I enrolled in my women's studies class, I expected the more privileged group of white males to be discredited the most out of any group, as they are the ones who continue to hold this country's power. But I myself wanted to take part in this, for as a male, I take the unequal treatment most men give to women on a personal level.

Though it is from a different perspective than women, I am just as disgusted with the inequalities our culture and legal system perpetuates. As much as egalitarian women despise being looked at as just another "woman," being stereotyped as a "typical" male is one of the most offensive insults you can give me.

Allowing men into feminist theory classes not only allows men to gain a background in gender inequalities but shows women that men can be just as interested in women's issues as women themselves are. Gender equality is never just a women's cause, but it is a cause of both sexes.

Adventures in car thieving

I love hate mail. I love reading it to myself and other people. It's good for the paper, it really is. At least people are reading.

Someone sent a letter about me two weeks ago, so I figure he's going to read this today. Here's a message for him: "Brian, thanks for the letter... by the way, you're a turd. You seem like the type to fall in love with 400-pound women who wear tight shirts. Okay?"

Anyhow, I thought I'd take this opportunity to write some more about my buddy Bernie. A ton of people have asked me if I had any other funny stories about him. I've already written about Weekend at Bernie's, Episodes I and II. This story is just as funny.

In June of 1997, almost my entire senior class from high school stayed at the Cape the week after graduation. Bernie was one of nine in my house (poor Bernie, he came two days late but we charged him the full rate).

After the three-and-a-half-hour drive to Dennisport, Bernie needed a nap, and we needed a car. So I jogged out to his Buick with Uncle Danny (it would take me 90 lines for me to explain to you why we call him Uncle Danny), and waited for big Pratter to steal Bernie's car keys while he was curled up in the fetal position in bed.

Pratter and Uncle Danny both weigh over 300 pounds, so they quietly pushed the car down the road while I steered in neutral. And we were off...

We did what any 18-year-old kids would do in their buddy's car. We sped down the main drag, 25 mph over the speed limit, blasted the stereo, and stopped at the corner store. But on the way back, we did something that I still feel guilty about to this day.

About two miles from the house, we approached a plaza. There was an enormous sign for Ace Hardware out near the road. I looked at Pratter with a huge smirk on my face, and he smiled back at me and said, "Are you thinking what I'm thinking?" You bet I was.

Aaron Saykin

Fifteen minutes later, we emerged from the Hardware Store with four new sets of Bernie's car keys. Man, were we going to have a great time confusing the life out of him. We drove back to the house, where Bernie was still innocently nestled in his bed. Uncle Danny quietly put the keys back and announced to the house that everyone would have access to a car that week. We cracked open our beers and cheered.

Well, that night the girls from Holyoke Catholic High came over to our house. We loved those girls. (I'll get fired if I elaborate on "orgy week.") We had your run-of-the-mill night of drinking during the first week of freedom in our lives. It was a precursor to college, and we were on cloud nine. It was the last time my high school friends and I ever did anything together like that.

The Catholic girls eventually left but did invite us back to their house, which was only about five miles away. It would have been a long walk, too .. would have been, that is, if we didn't all have a set of Bernie's car keys. So there was Bernie, curled up in bed in his fetal sleeping position with a puddle of drool next to his mouth. Poor, poor Bernie.

Pratter, Uncle Danny, the chef, L.B. and I walked out to his car and got in. Funny thing was no one got into the driver's seat because we were all bombed and figured Pratter would just drive. He usually does. (I'll tell you the "puke posse" in the back seat of the Lincoln story next time.)

Pratter was about to pass out, though. The chef offered to drive, but his face was filled with Irish Sunburn. You know he's way too drunk to drive when he turns bright red. Then L.B. volunteered, but at the time, he could barely see over the steering wheel and looked about 14. I figured it was a sure bet he'd get pulled over.

So, by default, I was the designated driver. Back in high school, seven beers was a lot. C'mon, admit it. You were a "two-beer queer" in high school, too. I pulled out my shiny new set of Bernie's keys and we were off in his car again. A hundred yards from the house, I ran into trouble. I saw this big white cat running out in front of the car, and I was driving way too fast to stop.

I had never hit an animal before and I froze. But then I looked closely. It wasn't a cat. It was a fat, ugly opossum. So I floored it and ran the dumb rodent over. The car made the biggest thump I have ever heard, and everyone inside was quiet for a second. But my friends are just as bad as I am and loud laughter followed the moment of silence. I think I screwed up Bernie's car.

About three hours later, we found our way back to the house. Bernie was up and about, and came outside stunned.

"How the hell did you take my car? I hid my keys," he said.

We were drunk and Pratter said the dumbest thing I've ever heard. "Oh Bernie, I know how to hot-wire it."

And Bernie believed it. So all week long we took off in his car, and told him we had hot-wired it. He didn't even catch on when everyone in the house knew how to "hot-wire" his car.

And to add insult to injury, when we came home from the Cape, the Bernie pranks did not cease. We found his car at Crosier Field, where he was watching his brother's baseball game. So we did what any good friends would do. We moved his car to a spot nowhere near where he had parked.

And he didn't know we had his keys. We still have them to this day, but I can't tell you any more because he would kill me if he found out.

Anyway, I parked his car illegally outside the Student Union, so I've got to run. I wouldn't want him to get a ticket. Poor, poor, poor Bernie.

And for my next trick...

When I was a kid, I used to be a Boy Scout (lay off). And one of the numerous perks of being a Boy Scout was a subscription to the magazine Boys Life. The magazine had helpful features such as "How to track a bear in the woods" and "Poison sumac — nature's deadly treat."

Embedded in this fine magazine one day was a feature on the best magicians. They had three — Harry Blackstone, David Copperfield, and, like, Jimmy the Magic Guy. I don't know — his name escapes me.

Anyway, they asked each magician about his favorite trick to perform. Copperfield talks about making the Statue of Liberty disappear. Jimmy talks about entering a cage with a lion and turning it into a rabbit. Then I get to Blackstone, a guy who had his own cartoon show, a line of choose-your-own adventure books and multiple guest spots on "Scooby Doo." He said his favorite magic trick was one in which someone chose a card out of a deck, would put it back in the deck, and he would be able to find the same card.

Mike Messaros

Harry Blackstone — the Florida Marlins of magic.

I was unimpressed by Blackstone. I could do that trick after a couple of days. But making the Statue of Liberty disappear... whew, that would take a few more months.

There are still things in life I don't understand. Like why theater majors insist on spelling it "theatre" (come on — welcome to America, Lord Applemore). Or the theater major in general. Or Chancellor David K. Scott's jokes ("I intend to reduce the number of faculty at this school, even in the already hurting humanities..." Oh, wait...).

And magic tricks — ooh, I didn't understand all of them, but I wanted to. I was fascinated.

I practiced these tricks every night. (Being a Boy Scout and a fan of magic basically reduced the need for girls in my life. At least I like to think of it that way. And let me add this: isn't it a tad ironic that the Boy Scouts won't allow homosexuals to join, but at the same time being a Boy Scout makes you inherently unattractive to the opposite sex? It's like a lose-lose situation.)

But yet, for all of my hard work, I am not a magician. Magic escaped me for years afterwards. But seeing that David Copperfield is coming to campus made me remember all those years of "You chose the ace of spades... the five of diamonds. Queen of hearts?"

Let me make this into a political statement: This sends a strong message to the rest of the Five-College area — if you want good a cappella, go to Amherst; if you want a good reproductive rights rally, go to Smith. If you want a kick-ass magic show, come to UMass. Huzzahs for UMass!

While I'm used to this school dropping the ball on just about everything, they've really come through on this.

And I can only believe that Mr. Copperfield will have a few tricks up his sleeve specially tailored to the venue he's playing:

"I am going to turn this classics major into a viable member of the workforce!"

Gasps rise from the audience. "That's just witchcraft, plain and simple." And if there's one thing I've learned from my three and a half years at this institution, this state doesn't take too kindly to witches.

Which leads me to believe that there will be protests. Because besides kick-ass magic shows, UMass is known for another thing — knee-jerk reactions.

"Down with witches," they'll yell. "Only a witch would be able to walk through the Great Wall of China!"

"Or a communist!"

"Yeah, down with communism!"

"Hey, wait a minute, communism is a way of balancing out the haves and have-nots. I think..."

"I think you should shut your pie-hole."

The best protest in the past few years has been the "Save Our Beer" rally. Unfortunately. Really, it was a surgical strike right to the heart of the administration. A stupid surgical strike, but a surgical strike, nonetheless.

Nothing ruins a good protest like the fragmentation of the protesters. There's no bigger faux pas than to show up at a rally with your "Large Corporations Rock" sign, and then find out it's a "Racism isn't cool/ Down with capitalism" rally (it's one of those kill-two-birds-with-one-stone rallies). Boy, then you have egg on your face.

"Being a Boy Scout and a fan of magic basically reduced the need for girls in my life. At least I like to think of it that way."

Anyway, back to Copperfield. People are yelling, people start smoking the "Mary Jane," Goodell gets taken over, and no one can decide where to order their calzone from. "Pinocchio's!" "No, D.P. Dough!"

And once people start getting chippy like that, they start getting into rock fights.

Letters to the Editor

Strategies target ALANA students

Editor's note: The following letter was written on 2/25/99.

To the editor:

After reading your staff's coverage of the emerging campus-wide debate on affirmative action admissions policies, the Executive Committee of the Graduate Student Senate felt it necessary to clarify some points and add our perspective on these issues.

In the article which appeared in your Feb. 24 issue entitled "Chancellor Scott defends affirmative action plan," you make reference to Chancellor Scott's "changing strategies" on implementing affirmative action. You also mention the Chancellor's ideas on shifting the focus of affirmative action policy to "systemic outreach" programs.

All four of the executives of the GSS attended the meeting when the Chancellor made these comments. The only thing clarified by the Chancellor's comments regarding "changing strategies" on affirmative action policies is that there is no alternative strategy.

The only "strategy" suggested by the Chancellor that could even remotely be considered concrete is a program designed to reach out to high-risk children in middle school — a program that he himself admitted may take 30 to 40 years to have any discernible impact on college admissions. A fine idea, but no help for the hundreds of thousands of college- aged students of color who in the meantime will be denied access to public higher education.

The numbers speak for themselves. The Chancellor himself admitted, in the meeting and elsewhere in the press, that the "strategy change" announced last Friday will likely result in at least a 6 percent drop in ALANA student admittance. As the Collegian reported in a Feb. 23 article, only 12 of 272 applications submitted by ALANA students to UMass Amherst have been accepted. We are supposed to wait 30 years for "systemic, social change?"

The decision announced last Friday regarding affirmative action in admission policy is clearly an abandonment of the only admissions policies that have made any real difference in promoting diversity on this campus and on campuses nation-wide. The policy decision is clearly an attack on ALANA students. And as far as we are concerned, the administration's decision to eliminate affirmative action in admissions policy is clearly unacceptable.

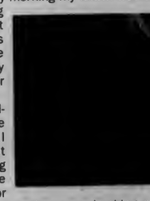
When you look in the mirror, who do you see?

I wrote this piece last year in hopes that those who would identify with it would not feel so alone and hopeless. Things can get better.

Today's Struggle



It is three o'clock in the afternoon and I am sitting alone in my room at school, reflecting on what I have consumed today. Two Fig Newtons and a Diet Coke for breakfast, three glasses of water and four Clementines for lunch. Not bad, considering the fact that nothing I have eaten thus far contains any fat. The plan is to hold out until dinner before I eat again, which will be a feat within in itself, considering that I am already thinking about food again.

NiCOle LaVin

I make several feeble attempts to occupy my time, hoping that some form of diversion will help me forget about my hunger. After some calls, I begin to read a book that I put down as quickly as I picked it up, and decide to prepare for a nap. Napping is the perfect solution. I can't eat if I am sleeping.

Another Day

Two years ago, at about this time of year, I was at the height of my problem with food. I was 18, insecure and very depressed. Every morning my alarm would sound, barking at me to get out of bed. This was the first struggle of another very difficult day for me.

After procrastinating for quite some time, I would slide out of bed and drag myself to the full-length mirror that receded across the room. Looking at my reflection, I would shake my head. At 5-foot-6 1/2 and weighing 135 pounds, I saw my image as being double what it really was. Cellulite seemed to ooze off of every bone, every limb, every inch of my body.

I was disgusted with the girl looking back at me. With a hopeless sigh I decided that I had had enough of looking at the body I disapproved of.

It was now time to get ready for the day that I wished was already over. Before stepping into the shower it was ritual for me to step onto the scale that sat under the towel rack. It read 135 pounds. How frustrating It was to spend yet another day at 135 pounds. Damn.

Once in the shower I would close my eyes as I washed my body. I didn't wish to take another look at the grotesque figure I had witnessed a few minutes before in the mirror. I needn't be subjected to that again. After getting dressed, I would take one more torturous look at myself, step on the scale again, and lose hope for another day.

Then it all began

Frustrated and angry, I knew something had to be done. I had no choice but to shed the pounds that were weighing me down both physically and emotionally. I knew that losing weight in a healthy manner would be impossible, though, considering my love and compulsion for food. Food was my best friend, my entertainment and my emotional crutch.

I ate whether I was hungry or not, bored, sad, depressed– you name it. Wherever I was, whatever I was doing, I was shoveling food into my mouth. How could I possible restrict the consumption of what kept me alive, scientifically and spiritually?

Is this Appealing?

At first I was very restrictive. I refused to vomit in public. I had way too much pride for that. Therefore, if I were at school or work all day, I would starve myself until I got home. I knew that I could survive off of Diet Coke for the majority of the day. If I had to eat, I would hold off for as long as possible and when I couldn't take it any more, I would eat a small portion of some low-calorie food like celery or carrots.

It was so difficult for me to keep from eating, seeing as how I was surrounded by sweets and tempting snacks all day at work. If I managed to stay away from food for the day, it was a day that had gone well. A pat on the back was well deserved if I held out until dinner. If I slipped and ate something, I would only allow myself to consume beverages for the remainder of the day.

Once home, I would indulge in a large dinner, eating salad, vegetables, and perhaps dessert. I don't eat meat, so that was never a worry. Upon the conclusion of my dinner I would rinse my plate, walk down to the bathroom, and deftly close the door behind me. I was trying to be as inconspicuous about my "problem" as possible.

I would run the water and flush the toilet as often as possible so as to muffle the sound of my vomiting. These actions would later prove to give me away, as my mother wondered why the water was constantly running immediately after dinner.

After hanging over the toilet bowel, I would go to the sink to wash my face and rinse my mouth. I would have to pick regurgitated food out of my hair and off of my face, which was followed by the application of make-up to hide the blood vessels that had burst during my strain to empty food out of my stomach.

A personal struggle with bulimia

My fingers reeked of a rancid, acidic stench that resulted from cramming them down my throat, yet I still continued this hardly glamorous routine known as bulimia.

I was a glorious 120 pounds and I was dropping weight daily. For the first time in my life I heard someone refer to me as a waif, which sadly pleased more than upset me.

Talk About Desperation

As time crept on, my bulimia became more severe. I began to vomit everything I ate. A banana for a snack. Six cookies and Ice cream, followed by chips, or any other form of junk food I could find. A salad. Healthy or not, I would vomit every morsel of food that crossed my lips.

I began to vomit at work, but still never when in the presence of my friends, who had then become suspicious of my behavior. I once told a friend that I was too tired to watch a movie at eight o'clock at night and asked her if she could please drive me home. The thing is, I wasn't tired at all. Actually, I had just eaten about two dozen cookies and french fries that needed to be cleansed out of my system.

My friend knew fully well what I was doing, she was merely unable to do anything about it. She sighed and shook her head as I ducked out of the car.

The necessity to vomit my food overcame me. I would stay up late and wait for everyone to go to bed so I could binge and purge in complete privacy.

There were times when I went as far as to take kitchen pans into my bedroom to vomit. I would turn up my radio, and use the pan as my surrogate toilet. When no one was around I would empty the pan's contents into the toilet, and then proceed to wash and sterilize the pan In the kitchen.

Nothing could possibly keep me from my routine. I was a prisoner of an institution I created in my mind.

The People Who Love You are Bound to Find Out

I will never forget the day my mother approached me about my bulimia. What happened devastated me, and reduced me to feeling barbaric, like an animal.

My mother unlocked the bathroom door and walked In on me during the process of throwing up. "This needs to stop!" she yelled through her tears. "You have to stop doing this! This is ridiculous!"

She was crushed, and I was ashamed.

I didn't know what to do. Water running, I reached for the toilet handle and flushed that night's dinner as quickly as I could. I sobbed and screamed at the top of my lungs, "Get out! Leave me alone! Just get the hell out!"

The Road for Help Is a Long, Bumpy Road

After a month later, after things calmed down, and my mother and I had surpassed the tension we had been experiencing, we were able to discuss the fact that I needed to get help. I knew that I needed to get control over my bulimia. I didn't want to be fat, but I hated living the way I was. Food controlled every aspect of my very being, and I was tired of living in the hell that I had created and was unable to escape. I was fading fast.

For my mother, I went to see a therapist in a town nearby. I was still bitter when my counseling began, so it is no surprise that things did not work out with her. I wanted to rid myself of the demon that had a hold of me, but I was unwilling to share all of my feeling s and really dig my heels into getting better. Back to square one. A few months later I began to see a different therapist, who I still see to this day. After months of therapy, she has helped me to pinpoint some of the reasons underlying my bulimia, and to wean me off of my vomiting routine. I began to feel better about my relationship with food, and more importantly about myself.

While there is a great deal of counselling available to help those already suffering from eating disorders, prevention is another aspect that must be looked at. Thomson believes there needs to be a change in the way people think about food and body image.

A survey of 33,000 Americen women found that 90 percent believed they were too fat, while 45 percent were actually underweight.

"People need to understand that it's a psychologicelly- based illneas, there's much more than meets the eye," ahe said.

Thomaon attributes the diet industry and the media with perpetuating unnetural weight and beauty standards among women. Billions of dollers are spent on the diet industry each year, yet, of all dieters, 95 percent will regain any weight loat. Thomaon believes the focus needs to be placed on teaching people to exercise and eat healthy, and natural weight loas will occur.

"Being overweight does not automatically mean thet you're unhealthy. Many overweight people are physicelly fit." Thomaon said.

People must recognize, ahe noted, whether or not they have a large frame, aa this can contribute to body aize.

"A lot of people don't understand how to eat normally anymore. We're all individual around food, we can't be expected to eat the same wey. Everybody's got different needs for eating, and different metabolisms," ahe said.

Multicultural Film Fest opens tomorrow at Herter

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

This spring, the University of Massachusetts will host a flowering of films from all over the world as part of the sixth annual Multicultural Film Festival entitled Nation/Generations: New Filmmakers.

The films in this year's festival will focus on relationships between generations in nations from around the world, exploring both the representation of historical and cultural change in contemporary world cinema and the search for personal and historical identities.

Screenings of new and recent film productions will be in both 16mm film and video format. The festival includes discussions with filmmakers and scholars, and even features a workshop with screenwriters and directors.

The festival kicks off tomorrow with a program entitled "Mexperimental Cinema: Avant-Garde Media Arts From Mexico." The program explores the work of film and video makers from Mexico who have rebelled against narrative conventions in the last 60 years. The program will be introduced by Josh Kun, Five-College Center for Crossroads in the Study of the Americas, and co-curated by Jesse Lerner and Rita Gonzalez. The program will be held at 8 p.m. in Herter Auditorium 227.

Highlights from the two-month long festival include a screening of Smoke Signals, the recent, critically acclaimed adaption of Sherman Alexie's tale of a young, Native American man's journey to retrieve his lost father's body for burial. Smoke Signals will be screened Wednesday, March 24.

The festival also features a special panel and workshop on screenwriting and directing with industry professionals screenwriter Andrew Horton, director/screenwriter of the festival-screened No Budget Story Renos Haralambidis, Ohio University professor of film Rajko Grli_, and independent filmmaker Bernd Sahling. Registration is required for the workshop.

The festival concludes on Wednesday, May 5 with a screening of the Brazilian Central Station, winner of the 1999 Golden Globe for Best Foreign Language Film. The film follows the physical and emotional journey of Dora, an older woman from Rio de Janeiro, and her companion Josue, a young boy who attaches himself to her after his mother's death.

Between tomorrow and May 5, the Festival will screen 11 unique films in the Five-College community. The films will be held Wednesday nights at 8 p.m. in Herter Auditorium 227, unless otherwise noted in the festival brochure. A one-credit colloquium is available to undergraduate students who attend 10 of the 13 festival events.

Big 'L'oss: Hip–hop community mourns another casualty

By David Katzoff

The culture of hip–hop was primarily established as an outlet for creativity. It's four elements converged and created a small fraternity amongst the impoverished socio–economically deprived citizens of the South Bronx in the mid–70s. Over the years a sole resounding element pulsated through the streets and spread like wild fire in urban communities nationwide.

In rap's pre–adolescence stage rappers were known more commonly for rocking parties than critiquing their social environment. Then Grandmaster Flash spoke those prophetic words, "don't push me cause I'm close to the edge/I'm trin' not to loose my head." and innovated an entire genre a lyricism. "The Message" intensely changed the spectrum of hip–hop as emcees began relieving their angst via rhyme called "message rap."

Thereafter the music marked its shifts according to the environmental changes around its creators. When crack–cocaine was initiated to these same urban communities, the lyrical content translated accordingly. Street drug entrepreneurs, gangs, guns, materialism and violence established itself in hip–hop as topical evidence of the crises surrounding inner–cities.

Rap–as several of its own tragically murdered in contexts parallel to its lyrics. Scott La Rock, Cowboy and Trouble T–Roy to name a few) were among the metaphorical front line casualties in an on–going concrete war.

Now nearly a full decade later, Biggie Smalls, Tupac, Wobb Deep's Scarface and many others are still being slayed as Black Star's re–proclamation, "it's kinda dangerous to be an emcee," sadly still manifests truth.

The latest casualty is Harlem–born lyricist Big L, who was fatally gunned down in his own neighborhood in New York in late February. Leaving behind a short legacy of promising talent, L will be remembered for his boastful flow and cunning, youthful delivery.

In 1995, Big L blessed us with Lifestyles ov da Poor and Dangerous, which was a deft assembly of rhymes that included underground favorites "MVP" and "Put It On." Although the album was fairly unsuccessful, L was well– recognized by the Diggin' In The Crates crew in which he became a full–fledged member.

After a fall–out with his label, Columbia Records, he decided to begin working on his own company, Flamboyant Records. The past three years, L was featured on several D.I.T.C. productions as well as a duet with O.C. off the Jewlez LP.

Big L's finest accomplishment was his savvy ability to circumnavigate the cut–throat business of rap music and independently released a self–produced 12" record. Last year's under–appreciated "Size 'Em Up" marked L's solo return and was easily one of the more clever outputs of 1998. On "Ebonics (Criminal Slang)," L daringly executed a brilliant break down of hip–hops street slanguage.

Although L never exemplified desensitizing verbal violence on the mic, he was hardly a bashful rapper. He often gracefully related the realism that encompassed his life and admitted that he could put down rap and "go back to selling drugs again and busting slugs at men" if needs be.

Unfortunately, the harsh world that parallels these thoughts struck L full–throttle and he was shot seven times; three in the head, four in the chest. Authorities who arrived on the scene pronounced him DOA and claim they have no suspects or motives that prompted the shooting.

Once again it has come to pass that he who lives by the pen can still die by the gun. And again the hip–hop community is jarred with grief and riddled with questions. Ultimately L's death is another tragic lesson about the dangers of relating ego–induced realism on a record. Nevertheless Big L will sorely be missed. R.I.P.

azande's magical play Sanango mesmerizes

By Imogen Lillywhite
Collegian Correspondent

SANANGO
Fine Arts Center
Feb. 25

The world premiere of Sanango, a play by emerging playwright azande, opened to a bemused but receptive audience last Thursday night at the Fine Arts Center.

Sanango is the story of Natita, a young woman who is about to give birth. Her labor is halted by a nurse who refuses to allow the birth until Natita gives a name to the unborn child. In order to answer the nurse's interrogation, Natita embarks on a journey through time and geography meeting a diverse group of characters that both help and hinder her progress.

It becomes clear that each character is an element or an ancestor that will in some way effect the child's existence, except the nurse, who, according to playwrite azande, is "nothing more than an illusion, a self–inflicting manifestation of doubt."

The play is a co–production of UMass Theater and New World Theater, which typically focuses on new works and plays from the multicultural repertory. It boasts a very strong cast from the Five Colleges and is directed and designed for the most part by UMass MFA candidates.

The young woman Natita is immaculately played by Lucy Mae San Pablo Burns. Three wailing women, played by Viemebre M Roberts, Bonita Oliver and Onyinyechi Ihedigbo, act as a melodramatic play chorus. Candace Sala Hewitt plays Isis, the Goddess of Motherhood, with fluid grace and Richard James is a convincingly androgynous Leopold.

Angelique Hardy portrays the manically authoritarian nurse and successfully facilitates the introduction of some major themes of the play, including the concept of name as a label and the constrains of being born into "the state." Jonathan T. Mosley and Humphrey brown III are excellent as Ruby and Baba X, the proprietors of a run–down chicken shack. They provide a much needed humorous respite from the dramatic–to–the–point–of–hysterical atmosphere of much of the play.

The opening night of the play was impressively executed apart from the occasional technical flaw. Kathleen Iamsyn Thaw's costume and mask designs were ideally understated to support this dramatic and fantastical play.

Sanango has the magical quality of an adult Wizard of Oz. However, it concentrates profusely on the exploration of the self and the cynical and clinical attitudes that society and "the state" have towards procreation. Natita's journey is one that she must take in order confront and acknowledge history so that she may give life to the future.

Sanango will play through Saturday, March 6 with a matinee performance on the final day, after which playwrite azande will speak with the audience and answer questions about her innovative and complex play.

Massachusetts men's gymnastics downs Owls, improves to 6–2

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

The groundhog was right: the cold winter ended early this year, as the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team broke out of its slump with a crushing victory over Temple University this weekend. The Minutemen defeated the Owls with a final team score of 225.925–217.350. This score is the highest of the season for UMass, improving the team to 6-2 on the season.

"I think we're getting better," coach Roy Johnson said. "The key is to have at least four solid routines per event to get a high score. We had a lot of solid routines in the first four events, but struggled a little bit on the last two. A 226 is the great score that we needed, and we have the potential to do much better in later meets."

Junior Jeff LaVallee achieved an all-time school record high score in the all-around with a 58.275, and took the first–place spots on five of the six events. He finished first or floor exercise (9.675), the pommel horse (9.775), the still rings (9.925), and broke the all time highs on both the vault (9.80) and parallel bars (9.850), while tying for third on horizontal bar (9.250).

"This was a great meet," LaVallee said. "Everyone on this team has something to contribute, and it definitely showed tonight. We're not the same type of team as Michigan [in caliber], but if we continue to hit like we did tonight, we'll be right up at the top at Regionals and maybe even Nationals. This meet was definitely a stepping stone for later meets to come."

LaVallee took the all–around title with a substantial lead over his competitors, the closest one being Temple's Mike Moran. Moran and LaVallee have been long–time teammates in various Junior Olympic and Senior National competitions, but because they are on different teams, a rivalry has always existed.

"Mike is a great gymnast," said LaVallee. "He came in sixth all-around at NCAA Nationals last year, so he's a tough competitor. We're both at the same level [in gymnastics], and it was great to win the meet, but I wouldn't want to win any competition against him with him faltering. I always want to see him do a good job, and he definitely did tonight."

Also in the spotlight last weekend was senior Phil Lieberman, who finished second on high bar (9.45) and on the floor (9.55). Senior Dan Young made his presence known with a 9.35 on floor and a second–place finish for the Minutemen on rings (9.675). Sophomore Andrew Leis placed second on the pommel horse (9.750) and sophomore Bryan McNulty finished second on the vault (9.650) and third for UMass on floor (9.45).

Senior captain Stephen Pryor has been battling the flu, yet still managed to take third for the Minutemen on the still rings (9.6). Sophomores J.J. Hershey and Ben Kandel made their impressions at the meet, as Hershey took third on pommels (9.4), second for UMass on p–bars (9.2), and got a 9.537 on rings while Kandel earned an impressive 9.4 on the still rings.

This turnaround is exactly what the Minutemen have hoped for, and they will try to keep up their momentum into the remainder of the season. Up next for the Minutemen are two meets this weekend. They battle with Army on Friday and then take a short trip to Springfield for the New England Championships on Sunday.

Women's gym captures second at URI meet

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's gymnastics team continued its steady improvement by placing second in this weekend's quad–meet in Kingston, R.I.

The meet featured North Carolina State, Rhode Island and Vermont. Massachusetts' score of 192.075 was good enough to capture second behind N.C. State's team score of 194.225, and led the Minutewomen past Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island's 191.300 and Vermont's 181.650.

The meet illustrated the strides forward that the team has taken since its first meet of the season against URI on Jan. 16. In that meet, the Minutewomen barely out–distanced the Rams by a score of 186.500–185.725.

The two Massachusetts scores against Rhode Island show a more than 5.5–point improvement and do well in documenting how far the Massachusetts team has advanced this season from its start in the middle of January. Early–season mistakes have been ironed out and the result is a more well–rounded team.

Iobl Goldberg led the Minutewomen this weekend by placing second in the all–around. Goldberg was UMass' sole competitor in the event, recording impressive scores of 9.775 on the uneven bars and 9.650 on the floor exercise.

The Minutewomen had a dominating day on the uneven bars. As a team, the Maroon and White outscored every other team on that apparatus. Mandy Mosby, Anita Sanyal and Jennifer Pokrana all tied for third in the event with a score of 9.825.

Leading the Massachusetts squad on the floor was Mosby and sophomore Kyla Palombini, who both posted scores of 9.850 to tie for third on that event. Mosby scored well on the beam as well, notching a 9.825 to secure her highest beam score of the season. Matching that score was Jill Fischer. In addition to her beam score, Fischer's vault of 9.600 led the team and was good enough to place her at third on that apparatus for the meet.

Despite a good showing this weekend, UMass could not match a tough team effort from North Carolina State. The Wolfpack won three out of the four events with the lone exception being the uneven bars, which Massachusetts took by almost a full point.

N.C. State's Cara Charles' score of 38.475 secured her the all–around title over URI's Rena Ranieri (38.075). The Wolfpack's Maggie Haney was flawless on the beam en route to a perfect 10.000 and a team high 49.475 on that apparatus.

The Minutewomen return home this Saturday for their final home meet of the season against Yale, MIT and Bridgeport.

Women's hockey has mixed weekend

By Melissa Sherman
Collegian Staff

The opposition for the Massachusetts women's ice hockey team this past weekend was like night and day.

Morale was up on Saturday as UMass shut out Connecticut 9–0 in a home game. Junior Jenna Nolan jumped out with the first goal 12 seconds into the game with assists by junior Ellie Fernandez and freshman Sue Hornung.

The pattern throughout the rest of the game was similar and UMass took advantage in playing a punching–bag team.

It was an opportunity for UMass to play all its lines. The defense stepped up and played tough. Hornung played a strong game, resulting in her first collegiate goal. In net, sophomore Mindy Corr turned away 13 shots for her third shutout of the year.

Boston University was a different story. UMass fell short on Sunday at Walter Brown Arena where the old saying, "BU advantage" held true for the Terriers as they defeated UMass, 5–2. BU kept the Minutewomen off the scoreboard until late in the third, when it was far too late to catch up.

BU is a front–running club team that continuously poses problems for UMass. Two weeks ago the Terriers skimmed by with the win, defeating UMass, 2–1. Sunday was the Minutewomen's opportunity to come back and stir up BU.

The Terriers lead the Minutewomen 2–0 after the second period. But UMass was still in a good position to hold its ground and catch up. However the game turned in the third in favor of the Terriers.

"BU plays a lot of top Division I teams and that shows in their skill. They're strong competition for us, but it would have been a different game if our top offensive players were there," Nolan said of the shortcomings in UMass' first line.

"We killed off a lot of penalties, a runaround defense got us tired, we missed offensive opportunities, we just couldn't put pressure on BU's top line and it cost us the game," UMass coach Scott Martinez said.

They went down fighting as Kristen Szczepanski scored the first goal for UMass late in the third followed by Nolan at 14:46, sending the Minutewomen's record to 14–5–0.

Ski teams do battle in Vermont

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

In the classic western The Magnificent Seven, a group of dangerous gunslingers join forces to protect a small Mexican town against a gang of notorious thugs.

At this weekend's NCAA Eastern Regional Championships in Vermont, the Massachusetts ski teams sent their own magnificent seven, intent on protecting their reputation against Northeast ski giants like Vermont and New Hampshire.

And just like in the movies, the seven more than held their own against their formidable adversaries. But in a cruel twist of life–imitates–art, the bad guys proved too much in the end.

Despite a flurry of aggressive skiing from the likes of senior All–American Tom Holden and freshman Tina King, the Maroon and White failed to qualify a single racer for nationals, set to take place the weekend of March 10th in Maine. UMass placed 12th as a team in the field of 17.

Holden hit a stumbling block in Vermont, in a senior season already teeming with success. The Lincoln native flew through the giant slalom in a scant 2:14.11, yet had to settle for 37th place in a very tough field.

"We know coming in that its going to be a very hard, technical course," said freshman Ken Thoman in the days leading up to Regionals. "We're expecting a lot of tricks, undergates and hairpins. It won't be easy, by any means."

King smashed all expectations with a dangerously fast run in the giant slalom (2:17.28) that was oddly worth only 26th place. The native of Easthampton used this tournament to put an exclamation point on a highly successful rookie season (King collected two giant slalom wins among her six top–5 runs).

As in the aforementioned western, UMass's magnificent seven got heat–of–battle contributions from all of its heralded young guns. Junior Christian Guertin of Ashburham emerged as the Minutemen's unsung hero, pacing the team with an impressive 29th in the slalom. Guertin's relaxed attitude going into Regionals may be one reason why the Dartmouth Regional graduate was the only man in Maroon and White to finish both events.

"I don't really have anything to prove," said Guertin prior to the meet. "I set goals for myself early in the season, but at this point I'm pretty relaxed. It's a different mentality."

Guertin tied with teammate Rich Granger of Princeton in the GS, in 41st place after identical times of 2:15.24.

Key runs were also chipped in by freshman Lauren Brodey (37th in GS) and sophomore Margaret LaBombard, who's experience translated into a 30th in the slalom and a 47th in the GS.

The story of the weekend came, ironically enough, from northeast power UVM. Catamount standout Erica MacConnell, granddaughter of UMass coach Bill MacConnell, was the talk of the tournament after winning the GS in 1:07.54 and blazing to sixth (50.06) in the slalom.

Holden, Thoman, Guertin, and Granger will join forces with sophomore Mike Hadden to compete in the United States College Ski Association Nationals at Mammoth Mountain, Calif. on March 9–13.

Men's track takes second at NE finals

The Massachusetts men's indoor track and field team made a statement at the New England Championships held February 26–27 in Boston. Clearly in a mixed pack of schools and abilities, UMass came out on the better half.

The Minutemen tied for second place with the Rams of Rhode Island with 63 points, behind a very strong Connecticut squad which produced 106.5 points. This second–place showing is a record for Massachusetts.

Yale, representing the Ivy League, finished fourth with 45 points. The Boston University Terriers were barely represented as they combined for six points total to round out the top–five finishers.

The Minutemen got the job done with numerous first–place finishes on the track. Ben Baraldi, of Longmeadow, claimed the 55m hurdles with a time of 7.74 seconds.

Senior standout, Tom Toye was victorious in the 200m dash, racing to a 21.60 finish. The Scarborough, Maine native also secured second place in the 55m dash to the tune of 6.18 seconds.

Neil Concepcion, a mainstay for Massachusetts through the years, took second in the hurdles in 1:04.06. The senior from Hayworth, N.J. has also been a consistent competitor for UMass.

The field events were less successful with only a pair first– place finishes. Senior, Andre Roach, of Springfield, captured the triple jump with a leap of 47–feet–3 1/2–inches. The other blue ribbon winner was freshman Wes Shaw of Auburn, who cleaned up in the pole vault, clearing a height of 15–feet–6–inches.

Next up for the Minutemen are the NCAA Championships. They will be held in Indianapolis, Ind. on March 5–6.

averaging almost a double–double, hovering around 20 points and nine rebounds. He is only the second player in the history of the school to have his number retired, the other being Rick Barry. Not a bad guy to share that honor with.

Gabe Lewullis, Princeton: It is tough to put an Ivy Leaguer on the All–America team and Lewullis falls victim to this. The inside/outside threat is putting up nearly 16 points a game. At a glance, that is not All–America material, but when you take into consideration that the Tigers only average 55 points a game, his contribution seems that much more impressive.

Ron Artest, St. John's: Artest's game is complete. Felipe Lopez was the last native New Yorker to stay at home to play and he did not pan out for the Johnnies. Artest, though, is the total package of size and ability which gives him an edge when it comes to the small–er guards of the Big East and the slower small forwards. Artest is not a disappointment, as was Lopez. Look for this guy to be bypassed, but not for the lack of ability.

B.J. McKie, South Carolina: McKie will be overlooked because of South Carolina's disappointing season. The shooting guard is the only player that can put up points for the Gamecocks, so his scoring numbers are down from a year ago when he led the Southeastern Conference in points, but that is not due to the lack of talent. McKie is a true scorer and with no one to relieve some of the pressure, he is the focus of opponents' defense. Even with this, McKie still pours in around 17 points a night.

Shawnta Rogers, George Washington: Let's be a little biased. The pesky 5–foot–4 guard is the hands down Player of the Year in the Atlantic 10. Rogers averages 20 points, seven assists, and four steals which ranks among the best in the country in all categories. He led GW to the A–10 West title and has made big play after big play all year.

Koenigsberger is the only starter who saw time last year, as UMass' first man off the bench. Sophomore John Hutchen returns to the team after sitting out last season with an ACL tear suffered during a preseason scrimmage.

"John has done a nice job of getting his knee back in shape in the off–season and he tested well in December," Cannella said.

Freshman Matt McFarland, a member of the U.S. National Under–19 team will be the unit's third starter.

After today's contest against the Crusaders, the Minutemen will head to Ithaca, N.Y. to take on Cornell, a new addition to the schedule.

"Cornell's a huge game for us. They were second in the Ivy last year," Cannella said. "They're very hungry and they look at this game as an opportunity."

Men's lacrosse opens with HC

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Fans familiar with the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will see a new-look squad when the Minutemen take the field in their season-opener today.

Gone is All-American defenseman Harold Drumm. Gone is top scorer Mike DelPercio. Gone is all-star goaltender John Kasselakis. Gone, in fact, are nine key members from last year's team.

What remains — after the addition of several key freshmen and redshirt-year returnees — is a unit that may surprise some opponents.

And UMass gets its first chance to put its talents on display this afternoon at 2 p.m. when Holy Cross visits Richard F. Garber Field.

"This first week will help us identify what this team is all about," said Minuteman coach Greg Cannella, who is entering his fourth year at the UMass helm.

With no superstar, Cannella will rely on his first midfield to provide a large share of the needed leadership, since seniors Jay Negus and Mike McKeefrey and sophomore Jeremy Guski saw a lot of action last season.

"It's very important to get leadership out of our first midfield because the young guys need someone to follow," Cannella said. "Neither of those guys, Jay or Mike, are rah rah guys. They lead by example. But they have to realize they still have to be a leader even if they are having trouble on the field."

Having the midfield set a pace for the UMass offense should help the relatively young attack. The sophomore trio of John Madigan, Kevin Dell and Rick Kunkel should see significant action. Madigan is the most game-tested of the three, although Kunkel did see increased time toward the end of the season last year.

> 1999 UMass lacrosse notebook
> Ranks in the Top 10 for all time winningest men's lacrosse teams
> Has made 12 NCAA appearances
> 1997 NCAA Quarterfinalist
> 1999 Face Off College Lacrosse Yearbook ranking: No. 12
> 1999 Face Off College Lacrosse Yearbook rank: UMass eighth in toughest schedule in nation
> Had fourth-rated defense in the nation in 1998, allowing only 8.42 goals per game

Dell stands only 5-foot-6, 125 pounds, but possesses the speed and athletic ability to out-manuever opposing defenses.

Juniors Mike Ianowicz and Jason Heinze provide the backbone of the attack, with the deepest pool of experience to draw on.

"We'll go as our attack goes," Cannella said. "If those guys do well, we'll do well. If they get shut down, it can be hard to get offense out of the midfield."

Just as the Minutemen's first midfield provides the leadership for the offense, the defensive midfield does so at the other end of the field.

Juniors Eric Sopracasa and co-captain I.T. Benazzi have both been starters since their freshmen campaigns, so Cannella will call on them to step up. Benazzi could see some faceoff action, along with Jeff Seals, David Kramer and David Breza. Sopracasa will start as the pole middie and could be spelled by Breza and sophomore Chris Gabrielli.

"I.T. is a good leader, he's captain this year. And he's an athletic player who can run forever. "Soup" is tenacious. If he gets a good matchup he can dominate people," Cannella said.

UMass' goalie situation is still up in the air, as Chris Campolettano, Tom Gilligan and Brian Soper all saw time in the preseason, but Cannella hopes the first week of the season will give a clearer indication of who will patrol the pipes.

"[They] all played well so far," Cannella said. "We're looking for one to separate himself from the other two. We'd like to play all three [today], but if no stands out we'll go with the hot guy."

Whoever mans the goal will have a relatively young close defense corps in front of him. Senior Justin

Duke looks to title; Cougars are sleepers

Bryan Smith

Duke... it's all about the blue and white, not the powder blue of North Carolina though. On Saturday, the Blue Devils took a perfect 15-0 Atlantic Coast Conference record down Tobacco Road eight miles to Chapel Hill for a matchup with arch rival North Carolina.

Duke was playing without defensive stopper Shane Battier, who was out with a high ankle sprain and who has been coming alive offensively in the last month. Without Battier, Duke stepped up its already astronomical intensity level even more. Battier's absence aside, the Blue Devils were out to make history.

With the conference's first 16-0 season, a 23-game win streak and the nation's No. 1 ranking on the line, Duke battled throughout the first half and ended the session with a slim two-point lead that could have been a one-point deficit had Ed Cota's three-point buzzer beater counted (his foot was on the out of bounds line).

In the second half, the Blue Devils proved their record was no fluke when they ran the host Tar Heels off the floor for their first win in Chapel Hill since 1991.

Player of the Year candidate Elton Brand and senior shooting guard Trajan Langdon get all the hype, but it is the supporting cast that led Duke to its historic ACC season.

William Avery is at the head of the pack when it comes to the underrated players. Avery was the backup point guard last year and saw limited action, but coach Mike Krzyzewski put the ball in Avery's hands to lead the team after Steve Wojciechowski's departure, and so far it has worked. The other pieces of the puzzle are swingmen Chris Carrawell and Nate James, all everything guard/forward Corey Maggette, and backup center Chris Burgess. Without these players Duke would not stand where it does today.

The season will not be considered a success unless the Blue Devils hang the National Championship banner in the rafters of Cameron Indoor Stadium next November.

• How about the College of Charleston? The Southern Conference must be foaming at the mouth after letting them join the conference this season. The Cougars swept through the conference, dominating all of its opponents. Charleston, by defeating Appalachian State in Sunday's final, will be making its third consecutive appearance in the field of 64 after winning the Trans American Athletic Conference the past two seasons.

After losing two of its first five games (at Georgia and at South Carolina), they head into the "Big Dance" with a 25- game winning streak including upsets over our beloved Minutemen and North Carolina at the Dean Dome. These guys are no joke. The Cougars are led by 6-foot-6 forward Sedric Webber and look to be a sleeper in the tournament.

If you find the Cougars in your bracket, you better be aware that they can play with the "big boys."

• It's time to give Michigan State the props that they deserve. When one thinks about the Spartans, the first name that comes to mind is Mateen Cleaves. Forward Jason Klein is a threat from the inside and the outside, but coach Tom Izzo has an even better weapon. The weapon comes in sixth-man Morris Peterson. Peterson is an explosive player on the offensive end who gives an instant scoring punch and anchors a defense that ranks among the best in the Big Ten.

The Spartans were inconsistent early in the season due to poor play from Cleaves, but as he began to bring his game back to the expected level, the team came together. Michigan State is peaking at the right time and is looking to capture a No. 1 seed in the tournament.

Staying with the Big Ten, take a look at Ohio State. The Buckeyes sport the best backcourt in the conference with Boston College transfer James "Scoonie" Penn dishing the rock and scoring more than 15 points a game and Michael Redd, who averages over 18 points a game. Penn came to Ohio State when coach Jim O'Brien left in the middle of athletic department turmoil at BC. Penn had to sit out last year, but it does not look as though it affected his game in the least.

Now here is a list of players that are going to get snubbed for All-American honors.

Steve Francis, Maryland: In a word, phenomenal. Francis is the most talented offensive player in the ACC and has turned the Maryland program into a contender. A junior college transfer is ripping up a conference that is down for the first time in years.

Tim James, Miami (FL): James has brought the Hurricanes into the top 10 in the country. James does it all. He is

Burns, Maclay wrap up memorable UMass careers

Senior walk-ons reflect back upon their Final Four days and their stint on CBS

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Both Ross Burns and Andy Maclay are not exactly the most recognizable faces around the world of college basketball. In fact, not everyone at UMass may be able to pick them out of a crowd.

But for 30 seconds both were playing to a national television audience. It has always been a Minuteman tradition to start the senior members of the basketball team on Senior Day. And last Sunday against Temple, the two walk-ons had their moment in the sun.

But the funny thing part about it was that those tuning in came awfully close to never knowing whom they were watching. CBS didn't have their photographs. They expected Mike Babul and Chris Kirkland to assume their regular starting roles. In the end, however, CBS had the photos, and Burns and Maclay had a moment to remember for the rest of their lives.

Ross Burns

He's not your run-of-the-mill body at the end of the bench. In fact, he's more of a Rudy story than anything.

It all began when he was a 15-year old boy playing basketball for Greenfield High School. With Amherst just minutes south, Burns found his way to John Calipari's basketball camp, where he would develop his relationship with two former UMass assistant coaches.

"I was pretty close with Bill Bayno and I've known Bruiser [Flint] really well, basically since I was 15-years-old or so, when I used to come up to camp here," Burns said.

After capturing the eye of both coaches, it seemed as though Burns was somehow drawn to UMass. A number of smaller schools recruited him, but his ties were too tight with the Minutemen. So he chose UMass, made the team as a walk-on, and vowed to make the most of his experience.

As a freshman, Burns was a member of the 1995-96 NCAA Final Four team, which featured NBA star Marcus Camby. He may have only played a handful of minutes, but he enjoyed the ride of a lifetime, one which culminated with a Final Four ring and a sense of satisfaction.

"I've had a great time. I went to the Final Four and had some great experiences with some great people," Burns said. "Not all of the guys on the team can say that they went to the Final Four, but I can."

Burns is also not the shy type. In practice he has a tendency to hit most of his outside shots, and then bug Flint about playing time. And when Burns finally made his first regular-season start last Sunday, it had a fitting ending.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Ross Burns

"I put him in the GW game [earlier in the year], and we actually ran a play for him. He get's fouled and misses two fouls shots," Flint said. "Before the [Temple] game [which he started], I told him, if we win the tap, don't be afraid. If you're open shoot the ball. He shoots an air ball and he's wide open... national television, too."

Burns missed the shot because his emotions were running rather high. But it was emotion which brought him to UMass, kept him the fan favorite, and had both he and Flint laughing after the game... and if everyone hadn't been watching, that same emotion might have made him try to convince everyone that he was fouled.

Andy Maclay

He may not be among the top players on his basketball team, but he's the only one with two rings. There's one for the 1996 Final Four, in which he and Burns both took part. But then there's his football rock — the one which he earned as a member of the National Championship team in the fall of 1998.

Maclay possesses a variety of talent on the floor, but he seems to do most of his damage on the field. In fact, he's regarded as the best punter in the history of UMass football — something which the Stroudsburg, Pa. native hopes can help him pursue the next level.

"The [Philadelphia] Eagles' training camp is about 20 minutes from my house," Maclay said. "A couple of people have said to me that it doesn't hurt to just go down there and say 'Hey, could I just have 15 minutes of your time?' I thought about driving around, just trying to get my name out there and see what happens."

Participating in one major collegiate sport is usually more than enough to wear down an athlete, but in Maclay's case, he figures that the less free time he has, the better chance he has of behaving.

"I played four sports in high school," he said. "I was a real energetic kid, so if I didn't have something creative to use my energy for, there was too much time on my hands to get into trouble."

Flint, however, seems to think his 6-foot-4 senior has an ulterior motive for joining the team... or he at least enjoys teasing him about it.

"I always tease him and tell him that he's only on the team for the gear, anyway," Flint said.

Behind his uncanny knack for juggling two major sports, Maclay hides a deep dark secret, or something he would classify as unusual taste in hair styles.

"My hair was yellow [before basketball season], so I couldn't come take the team pictures. I guess they superimposed my head on Mike [Babul]'s body."

But what seems to be no secret is his incredible athleticism and enthusiasm for both of his sports. If only Bobby Knight weren't the only person allowed to punt basketballs...

UM steals bronze in NFCA tourney

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

The weekend started slowly for the Massachusetts softball team but it rebounded to take the bronze in the NFCA Leadoff Classic in Columbus, Ga.

The tournament, which featured some of the toughest competition in the nation, proved to be overwhelming at first for the Minutewomen. In pool play, the No. 10 Minutewomen were stunned, 10-2, in the opener against Michigan State.

The Spartans shelled UMass starter Carrie Jefferies for 10 runs in 4 2/3 innings, while Michigan State starter Erica Struntz frustrated the Minutewomen, going five innings and only giving up two runs on one hit.

With ace Danielle Henderson on the mound, Massachusetts rebounded to beat Nicholls State, 2-0 in the following game. Henderson, improving her record to 3-1, struck out 17 and only gave up one weak infield hit in seven innings of work. Freshman Ashley Bakken continued her quick early start by going 2-3 and knocking in both UMass runs.

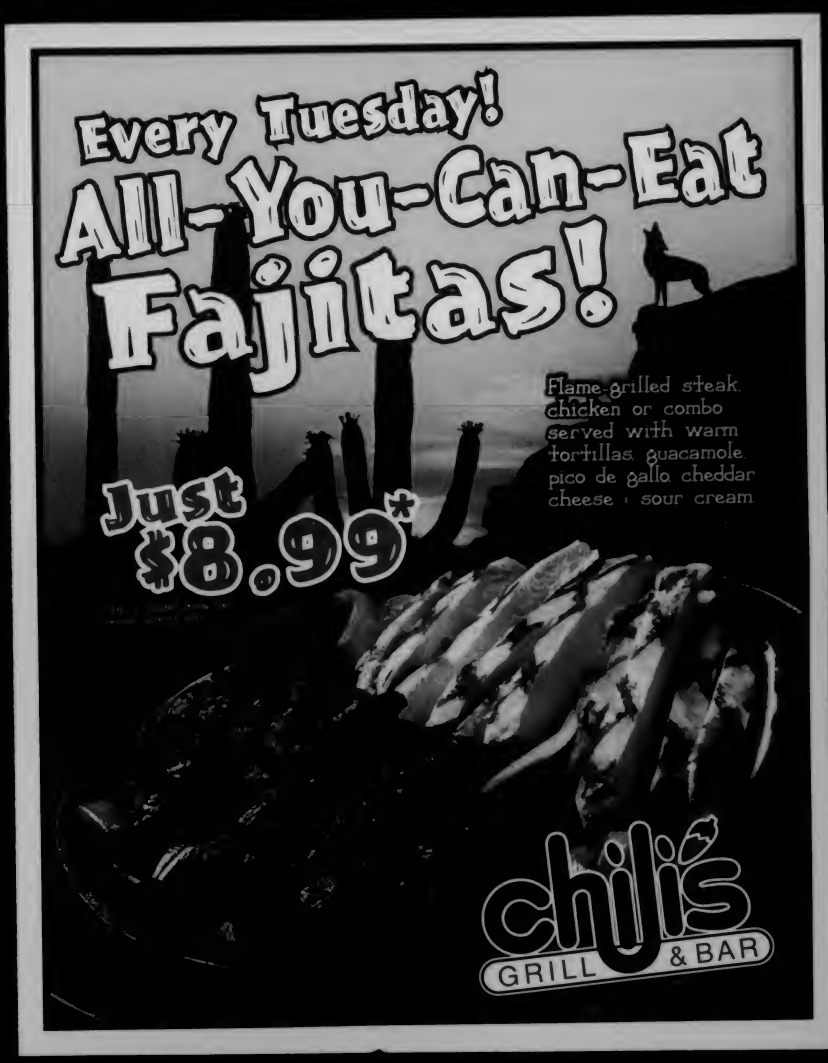
No. 11 Oklahoma proved too much for Henderson and the Minutewomen, defeating UMass 2-0. In a pitcher's duel, the Sooners Lana Moran surrendered only three hits in the game. Henderson, who also threw a three-hitter, made one mistake. In the fourth inning with two out and a runner on first, Oklahoma blasted a home run over the fence in right field. That one hit proved to be the difference in the game.

Henderson, a senior, returned to the mound to face off against rival Connecticut in bracket play. Henderson equaled her performance against Nicholls State by recording a one- hitter while striking out 10 Husky batters in five solid innings of work, leading the Minutewomen to a dominating 8-0 victory.

The UMass offense responded to a poor showing against Oklahoma by exploding for eight runs, scoring in every inning. Terri Rooney went 2-for-2 and scored a run. Catcher Nikki Faessler went 2-for-3 in the game with a double on her way to collecting three RBI. Also shining for the Maroon and White was second baseman Mandy Galas. Galas, batting in the leadoff position, went 2-for-3 and knocked in a run.

Henderson was called on once again on Sunday as UMass faced No. 8 Nebraska in the semifinal. Henderson went all seven innings en route to recording her third one-hitter of the tournament. She racked up 13 Ks in the 4-0 Massachusetts win.

The difference in the game proved to be a three-run third inning. Oklahoma walked in the first run after Octavia Brown, Terri Rooney and Mandy Galas singled. Cherra Wheeler singled to bring home Rooney before Galas scored on a fielder's choice.



Massachusetts completed the weekend's turnabout by capturing the bronze in the NFCA Leadoff Classic. UMass downed Central Michigan, 2-1, moving their record above .500.

Henderson was once again the story for the Minutewomen. Pitching the complete game for the fourth time in the tournament, she gave up one run on only two hits while striking out 14 Central Michigan batters. The win improved her to 4-2 on the season.

UMass jumped out to the early one-run lead in the first off the bat of first baseman Cherra Wheeler. Central Michigan responded in the third with a run of their own to knot the game at one.

The winning run for the Maroon and White came in the fourth. Pinch runner Ashley Baaken scored on a sacrifice by Annie Smith for the game-winning RBI. Galas shined for the Minutewomen going 3-for-3 and scoring Massachusetts' first run of the game.

The Minutewomen have over a week off before returning to action on March 12 in the Florida State Invitational Tournament.

Driver of hit and run confesses to University police

A University of Massachusetts sophomore, Wilson Ortiz, was hit by a car early Sunday morning on Thatcher Way. According to Howard Nwadike, a friend who was with Ortiz at the time of the accident, Ortiz was struck from behind by a speeding vehicle.

Nwadike said he jumped out of the path of the car into some nearby bushes, but Ortiz was not able to get out of the way in time. As a result, his leg was struck and he fell, rolling across the street until he was stopped by a tree.

The car did not slow down, Nwadike said, and he ran after it, attempting unsuccessfully to locate the vehicle. He then called the police, and Ortiz was taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, where he was treated for a broken leg and ankle. He also received bruises to his arm and forehead, Nwadike said. He was released from Cooley Dickinson and is being treated at home, where he will be undergoing leg surgery today.

The case was being treated as a hit-and-run accident until yesterday, when UMass student Ravinderpal Chana identified himself to police and told them he had been involved in an accident the night before.

After interviewing Chana and examining his car, police determined he had struck Ortiz, and issued him a citation for leaving the scene of a personal injury accident and operating a motor vehicle without a license.

Post tenure review up for vote by professors

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

A proposition generating an enormous amount of controversy within the Massachusetts Society of Professors — the union representing University of Massachusetts faculty — will finally be voted on today.

The Periodic Multi-Year Review (PMYR) of faculty, commonly known as post tenure review, was drafted by the MSP while internal tensions, including a heated general assembly meeting on February 19, have been common occurrences.

In opposition to the proposal, Afro-American Studies Professor Robert Paul Wolff said — "The gravest challenge to the autonomy and independence of our professional lives that any of us has seen in the more than twenty-five years that I have been a member of the faculty of this university."

PMYR was designed by the MSP as a way to ensure that professors continue to maintain the quality of their work at the University after being tenured.

Under the proposal, tenured professors will be asked once every seven years to submit a "brief statement" describing their accomplishments since their last review as well as their goals for the future.

Their statements, along with annual faculty reports, curriculum vitae, and teaching evaluations, will be used by the Departmental Personnel Committee (DPC) and the Department Chair to determine whether to recommend that the statement be accepted or revised.

Should a recommendation be made to revise the statement, the faculty member in question, the DPC, and the Department Chair will work together to make an acceptable statement. If they are unable to do so, the issue will be brought to an appeal committee, which will decide on the appropriate revised statement. A follow-up review would then take place in three years time, and if the faculty member's dean, the DPC and the Chair decide that the goals outlined in the revised statement have not been achieved, the dean may refer the matter to the provost for disciplinary action or dismissal.

On February 20, 18 UMass professors signed a letter asking their colleagues to vote "no" on the proposal unless a number of revisions are made. Among their requests were that the "standards of judgement" be clarified, that the "references to accountability to external constituencies" be removed, and that "all references to dismissal and other disciplinary actions" be removed.

In an open letter to the faculty, Professor Wolff wrote, " I am quite sure that if implemented, the current MSP proposal would decisively and permanently undermine the freedom and independence of research and teaching on which the excellence of this, or any other, university rest."

Sara Lennox, a professor of Germanic Languages and Literature and vice president of the MSP, agrees. She too wrote an open letter to the faculty, in which she repeatedly stated opposition to PMYR.

"Even the supporters of PMYR, I

Man charged for attempted murder is held without bail

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Francisco Rivera, the individual charged with attempted murder for strangling his girlfriend at Brown Residence Hall Sunday morning, will continue to be held without bail until a pre-trial hearing scheduled for March 16.

Rivera appeared in Hampshire County District Court in Northampton yesterday afternoon with visible injuries sustained from shattering a window in his apparent suicide attempt.

Alan Rubin, his attorney, argued that Rivera was not a serious threat to the community and should be released on $1,000 bail.

"The person in the greatest danger here is Mr. Rivera," he said.

Rubin referred to police reports indicating Rivera had consumed a large amount of alcohol previous to the incident and said, "Given his level of intoxication, I think the Commonwealth will have a serious burden proving insidious intent."

Rubin said he believed alcohol was the primary factor in Rivera's actions Sunday morning, and argued that there is no further need for psychological evaluations. An initial evaluation was conducted at Cooley Dickinson Hospital, where Rivera was treated for lacerations to his face and torso, but no results have been submitted to the court as evidence.

Rubin suggested Rivera be released on the condition that he stay away from the victim, remain out of Amherst, report daily to probation, refrain from alcohol and drugs, and live with his mother in Framingham, leaving only when necessary.

But his suggestions had little effect on Judge Michael Ryan's decision to deny Rivera bail.

"I think there is probable cause, based on police reports, that [Mr. Rivera] committed most of these charges," Ryan said. "He is dangerous to the alleged victim... and to the community in general."

The court prosecution presented Rivera's history of abuse, including multiple charges of assault and battery and specific instances of assault in his relationship with the victim. According to the prosecution, Rivera had also threatened to kill the victim on Feb. 22, and almost succeeded in doing so during Sunday's assault.

"But for the intervention of a third party, [Rivera] would have killed her... she could not breathe," he said.

Rivera attempted to jump from a fifth-story window at Brown Residence Hall after an altercation with his girlfriend in which he strangled her. He was arrested Sunday morning and is being charged with attempted murder, domestic assault and battery, disruptive conduct and destruction of property.

Parking, town debate

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The debate continued last night during the Parking Garage Building Committee meeting over how much to ask from Town Meeting for a parking garage on Boltwood Walk.

The debate was over a difference of a few hundred thousand dollars, but more than that, over finding support from other committees and building a garage that will have some amenities.

A canopy over handicapped spaces leading to the Bangs Community Center that had been dropped previously in an attempt to save money, was again discussed because support for the parking garage would be needed from the Disability Access Committee during Town Meeting.

Also debated was the ever present issue of reinforcing the deck of the garage. Reinforcement would allow heavy vehicles access and provide more spaces but the $378,000 price tag for doing so was a deterrent for some committee members.

The additional $378,000 would be in place of the request of last year's Town Meeting for a 215 space garage that would cost $4 million. But without the reinforcement, the garage would have fewer spaces than last year's request.

The committee, with questions still remaining over some of the garages costs and funding sources, voted unanimously to go through with a plan for a garage that costs $4.3 million.

"I feel like we're double counting every contingency. We haven't gone to bid. We haven't even finished a design," said Elisa Campbell, co-chairperson of the committee.

Committee member Fred Hartwell said he could find a way to have the money for the reinforcement and the canopy.

"I'll go with it, but prove it to me. If we go for this we are stuck there," said Carl Seppala, a committee member. Seppala's hope is that the actual costs of the garage will not end up exceeding the $4.3 million being requested from Town Meeting.

Women's health issues to promote body awareness at upcoming Hillel event

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Hillel House and the Western New England Region of Hadassah, will co-sponsor a symposium on Women's Health Issues on Sunday, March 7, from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. The symposium, titled "Your Breasts, Bones, and Body: A Proactive Day of Dialogue and Learning," will be held at the Hillel House.

One of the organizers of the event, junior Chanel Dubofsky, said the purpose behind the event is to promote health awareness in women.

"It will be an afternoon of learning about our bodies and how we can take care of ourselves and how we conceptualize ourselves when we're ill," said Dubofsky. "It'll be a place where people can learn from each other."

Dubofsky said her involvement with women's health issues is a personal one.

"My mother died last year of breast cancer after 11 years. I wanted to commemorate her battle by bringing women to the forefront of health issues," she said.

A desire to form a student support group for others who had recently lost loved ones, sparked her organization of the forum.

Speakers will include Dale Mintz and Pat Levinson, both of Hadassah (a Jewish women's organization). They will be talking about personal health advocacy, the

SGA plans new events to involve more students

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Public Policy and Relations committee has decided to start programs designed to create more awareness of the SGA among students.

According to Jared Brooslin, Chairman of Public Policy and Relations, "SGA is moving aggressively towards getting more students to join the Senate. Presently there are nearly 30 seats vacant in the Senate. That is 7,500 student voices that the administration does not get to hear." Each Senate seat represents 250 students.

The committee is taking steps, such as postering, putting up flyers, and making Public Service Announcements on WMUA hoping to get more students aware of the benefits of SGA. They are pledging that further steps to create awareness will include telephone calls, e-mails, mailings and table tents.

It has also been decided that a rally will take place every month on the steps of the Student Union. According to Brooslin, "The rallies will be used to inform students of the issues that the administration and the surrounding community leaders, police, and landlords are trying to sneak by the students without noticing. Unknown to many students are the freedoms that they have on and off this campus that are due to SGA stepping in and stopping unfair and selfish acts against us."

The first rally will be Wednesday before Spring Break at 12:30 p.m. In light of the SGA elections for area governors, trustees, and president, the topic of the first rally will be general information and how a student can become involved.

Other then appealing to the students on campus that aren't involved in SGA, Brooslin also wants to keep the students that are involved happy. The committee along with the help of Speaker of the Senate Lisa Cook have thought of a few ideas to "liven things up a bit."

According to Brooslin, "Some of the possible actions we might take are potluck dinners before Senate meets so Senators can enjoy each others favorite dishes and get to know each other regardless of party lines. There is also a possible Senate barbecue or picnic when the weather gets nicer."

Brooslin also says Senators can expect candy flying through the air during his committee reports, as was the case at the last meeting. "There will be enough treats to make Senate enjoyable, but at the same time keep the professionalism that is needed for motions to be passed."

Associate Speaker Jodi Bailey said, "We want the student body to become more aware of what the Student Government does and that hopefully things like this will give the students a more positive perspective on SGA."

Yugoslav forces fire on Albanian area

By Anne Thompson
Associated Press

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia — Yugoslav forces pounded southern villages with tank and mortar fire yesterday, targeting ethnic Albanian refugees camped in the rocky, snow-dusted hills along the border between Kosovo province and Macedonia.

Heavy weapons, armored personnel carriers and trucks loaded with Serb police and Yugoslav army troops lined nine miles of border road, more evidence of President Slobodan Milosevic's military buildup in defiance of NATO airstrike warnings.

Several rebels and a Yugoslav army sergeant were killed in yesterday's fighting, the Serb Information Center reported, some of the heaviest fighting since U.S.-led peace talks were suspended last week. Border attacks in recent days have driven some 5,000 people from their villages, those with passports fleeing into Macedonia.

Western observers fear the sporadic violence could explode into a resumption of full-fledged war before peace negotiators meet again on March 15.

"It's an example of how volatile the situation is," said Norwegian Foreign Minister Knut Volleback, who chairs the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which monitors fighting in Kosovo.

About 2,000 people have been killed and 300,000 driven from their homes in a year of war for control of Kosovo, a southern province in the Serb republic that dominates Yugoslavia. The ethnic Albanian majority favors independence.

Women and children wept in relief yesterday as U.N. refugee agency trucks rescued them from a camp near the border village of Gajre, which came under heavy shellings yesterday, U.N. official Fernando del Mundo said the 250 refugees were taken to a school, leaving behind men who preferred to stay in the more remote camp for fear of being beaten or killed by Serb police.

"This is the first case in some time where people are staying in the open," said Kris Janowski, U.N. refugee agency spokesman. "And it has brought the refugee problem to the doorstep of Macedonia for the first time."

Yugoslav army sources blamed the conflict on rebels, telling the Serb Media Center that the KLA attacked before dawn to try and secure a corridor to Macedonia.

Elsewhere, fighters of the guerrilla Kosovo Liberation Army attacked a Yugoslav military convoy near Klina, a town 30 miles west of the capital, Pristina, according the Serb Media Center. Also west of the capital, the two sides clashed on Mount Cicavica. The ethnic Albanian-run Kosovo Information Center said Serb forces were attacking three villages.

Peace talks ended inconclusively last month in Rambouillet, France, with Milosevic refusing to accept NATO peacekeepers and ethnic Albanians balking at a deal for broad autonomy instead of independence.

U.S. and European diplomats, shuttling between the two sides this week, were optimistic Albanian negotiators would sign a peace plan in mid-March, as promised.

But Volleback, who met yesterday with Albanians in Pristina after a day in the Serb capital Belgrade, said Milosevic continues to resist the deployment of 28,000 NATO peace troops, including 4,000 U.S. soldiers, which is essential for any deal.

U.S. envoy Christopher Hill voiced the same sentiments after meeting with Serbian President Milan Milutinovic, saying "substantial differences" with Belgrade remained over the issue of deploying NATO troops to police any Kosovo agreement.

Milutinovic said agreement remained a long way off.

Getting Albanian negotiators to sign the agreement would give NATO a green light for air strikes against the Serbs. U.S. leaders on Monday repeated warnings that NATO was ready to attack Milosevic if he continued his repression of the ethnic Albanians who outnumber Serbs nine to one in Kosovo's 2 million population. In a political development that suggested Kosovo's rebels were leaning toward signing the autonomy deal, hard-line political leader Ademi Demaci stepped down yesterday as adviser to the KLA. Demaci, who spent 28 years in Yugoslav jails for advocating independence, opposes the autonomy plan.ning.

think, concede that PMYR is a policy of surveillance that significantly erodes faculty rights," she wrote.

One of her many complaints about the plan is that it gives deans the power to recommend a professor's dismissal.

"Never on this campus, to my knowledge, has a dean succeeded in bringing about the dismissal of a faculty member," she wrote. "Why do we wish now, explicitly and in writing, to give deans the right to do so?"

Despite these protests, many MSP members continue to express support for the program.

"The policy we've drafted has explicit protections for the faculty, particularly regarding their academic freedom, which did not previously exist," said Associate Professor of Linguistics John Kingston, the chair of the Periodic Multi- Year Review Committee and, like Lennox, an MSP vice president.

"It does so because we have carefully studied the policies at other institutions and we've consulted extensively with our colleagues," he said. "The committee held meetings with more than 30 departments on campus, representing all campuses and schools."

Additionally, oncologist Dr. Jeffrey Ochs will discuss the medical ramifications of the disease.

Dubofsky said it is important for college women to educate themselves as a form of empowerment.

"I think for people our age it is important to educate ourselves about all the possibilities. Diseases like STD's and cervical cancer tend to get buried in education about breast cancer," Dubofsky said.

"It is important to learn all about our bodies and the changes that take place in them."

Women, said Dubofsky, need to be more aggressive in their medical care. Too many times women allow things to happen, she said, that they don't really understand or want.

CAMPUS profile

COLLEGIAN STAFF

When a professor encouraged University of Massachusetts senior psychology major, Caroline Sunshine to apply for an All-USA College Academic Team, she never imagined herself being chosen for honorable mention out of the 984 college students that applied.

The award winners were announced in the Feb. 23 edition of the USA Today newspaper and were selected from colleges or universities based on grades, awards and activities, leadership roles, and public service.

Of the top three academic teams chosen, each consisted of twenty winners as well as 61 honorable mentions, in which Sunshine placed.

Sunshine is honored by the award and feels she owes her recognition to the fact she's dedicated to hard work and facing challenges.

"I feel I'm a very driven person. I'm very hard working and ambitious," Sunshine said. "I really love a challenge more than anything."

Sunshine was born in London and when her father moved to Boston to get a job with Tufts Medical School, she left her native country to spend her early childhood in Brookline.

Last spring Sunshine was interested in exploring her interests in psychology more and decided to spend a year in Costa Rica as a research intern through the Anti-Domestic Violence Delegation.

"I was conducting a psychological study interviewing the women about the consequences of the violence on themselves and on their children," Sunshine said. "I saw some pretty scary stuff."

Sunshine observed abuse case studies on women through the Battered Women's Legal Resource Center and even participated in the counseling procedures. She says she was exposed to injuries that were quite upsetting to see.

"A woman's husband had punched her in both of her eyes with his graduation ring, and this had temporarily blinded her," Sunshine said. "Her eyes were puffed up and she couldn't see."

In most cases, the abuses occurred within a relationship, and in 95 percent of the cases, the abusers were men and had abused their children in many instances, Sunshine said.

Upon her visit to Costa Rica, she witnessed police officers engaging in domestic abuse. Through her studies, she discovered a significant portion of abusers in Costa Rica are police officers. Other occupations including lawyers and doctors were close behind in the number of abuse cases. Per capita, this trend is comparable to the United States, Sunshine stated.

Sunshine performed a number of studies and delivered a presentation and published her results in the national Costa Rican newspaper.

Recently, she also dedicated her summer to the Mental Health Division of the Public Prosecutor in Washington, D.C. Sunshine feels it was a great experience in helping her come to terms with understanding people and their behavior.

"It made me realize how people like me could be abused," Sunshine said. "You don't think of it happening to someone you know but it does. It happens at every level of society."

The Anti-Domestic Violence Delegation had a big influence on helping her receive the USA Today recognition, she said.

Sunshine is currently involved in her thesis project on television and it's effect on non-verbal behavior in interpersonal relationships. She has a standing 3.89 GPA and dedicates her success to her desire to challenge herself with new experiences.

"I do stuff because I want to learn; a desire for new knowledge, new experiences. I really love a challenge more than anything," Sunshine said. "I don't think anything's worth doing unless you do it well."

Caroline Sunshine, a senior psychology major, received an honorable mention on the All-USA College Academic Team.

Material girls

I have a terrible affliction. It is called shyness. Being shy makes it hard to meet women. Honestly, I'll sit in class right next to someone and I'll read that stupid comic by James Shaker making fun of the hippies instead of making small talk and meeting someone.

At parties I'm no better. Britney Spears could walk through the door and I'd still be standing off by myself thinking I should talk to her, then never doing it.

Matt Frascella

I admit that I don't have all those sophisticated pick-up lines like, "Hey baby wanna get down," or "I take odorless garlic supplements and I feel great."

Monday was my birthday. Being 20 now, I made a resolution to end the regret. It is time to conquer my shyness and start talking to some females. After all, I am no longer in sixth grade at a time when dodge ball is cooler than girls.

What better way to start my 20th year off than by getting a date? I tried to get on Love Connection and Change of Heart, (you know those quality shows that are on the Fox network late at night where singles match up), but you have to live in the Metro Los Angeles area to go on those shows.

As I entered my dorm I was hit by a Godsend. Right by the elevator was a bright yellow poster advertising a date auction. "Think They're Hot," it reads, "Make a Bid & They Could Be Yours." At least when you can't talk to girls you can always buy them. It's the American way... no it's the Las Vegas way, but close enough.

I was beginning to wonder about college. Do people even date here? I don't think so. It is all about hookups. Personally, I don't like random hookups. I may be the only guy on campus that feels that way, but I would rather play dodge ball and read James Shaker's comics.

I admit that I have dabbled in the world of random hookups, but I don't see the point. It is all just one big game of conquest and fake adoration. I decided I don't want to be a player. It isn't for me. I have no desire to woo some girl just for one night so that she can just walk out of my life the very next day.

Besides, I had to sleep on the couch in the lounge last weekend because of a hookup and I was not a happy camper.

Maybe if I start going after random hookups now I can build a replica of the Washington Monument with girls' phone numbers who I will never call. It could be the triumph of my college career. Nah.

What it all boils down to is immaturity. Maybe most college kids are just too scared to foster a relationship for one simple reason: there is the danger of committing on a deeper level. God forbid we look for personality instead of who looks best in the newest Abercrombie shirt.

But, for a mere four dollars tonight at 7 p.m. I can walk to the Student Union Ballroom and bid on an actual date. I was very excited and I began to think of where I would take her when I saw the disclaimer on the bottom. "Date to immediately follow at party."

I am paying quality top dollar for a date and they can't even give me a real date off campus? I guess this gives the auctioned-off dates a chance to walk away from you if you start talking about updating your computer's RAM, or that you are the champion of Dungeons and Dragons in the Northeast Region and have upgraded your ogre's battle axe, or that you have various allergies to dust, peanuts and the color blue.

I decided that I am willing to shell out sixty dollars for a meaningful date. Since dating has become less common, the demand has gone up and so has the price. I learned that in Econ 104.

Sixty dollars was the birthday money my grandparents and great–grandma sent to me. Every year without fail they tell me to buy something for myself and not to save the money. I can just imagine the conversation about how I spent my birthday money this year.

"Matthew, did you get the money we sent you?"

"Yes, Grandma."

"Did you spend it on something nice for yourself?"

"Yeah Grandma, I went out and bought a date at a date auction, but she ran away. I think she got a little scared when I mentioned I wrote for the paper. Apparently it isn't very cool."

So much for dating. Even when you pay for one they run away. I honestly think it has gone out of style like rock & roll, a winning UMass basketball team, and Mr. Potato Head.

With over 35 dates to choose from though, I know it will be hard to resist missing the auction. Besides, auctions themselves are pretty cool. It may even be the only place on campus where you can still find people who are dating other than on TV.

My parents the hipsters

On numerous occasions I have made attempts to introduce my parents to the world of the hip, the in, and the generally cool. At times I have been mildly successful, and at others... well, lets just say I'm the child of some former die–hard hippies with an altered sense of what is inherently groovy. We have not always seen eye–to–eye.

There are, however, certain things that are more conducive to parent/child connections than others. In my case, I have discovered that, while at times quite disturbing and often humiliating, I can relate to my parents using music.

Elsa Allen

Take for example the six or seven Jimmy Buffett concerts that I have notched into the old belt with my mother. It was at a Jimmy Buffett concert, in fact, that I had the biggest breakthrough with my mother to date. Yes, in late August of 1995, Linda was introduced to her first Jell–O shot, or Jell–O "snap" as she called it. This was indeed a momentous achievement in my pursuits.

But, much was lost in the following years when her affinity for Mariah Carey became evident. I was forced to resort to desperate tactics.

"Here mom, listen to some Phish. What do you think?"

"You know what I don't understand," she would say, looking back at me innocently. "When I was a hippie, we wore patches on our clothes because they had holes in them and now it's in style."

My mother, on a side note, loves to talk about where she was and what it was really like. She called me in the middle of NBC's "The Sixties" to inform me that Haight/Ashbury was not that bright, and there weren't people dropping tabs of brown acid into each other's mouths.

My only response was "Mommy, what's brown acid?"

I have tried similar tactics with my father, who leans decidedly more towards classic rock n' roll. For his 50th birthday I invited him up here to see the original "rolling stone" himself, Bob Dylan. My reasoning was two–fold. First, I believed that one way to make my dad feel less intimidated about turning the big five–oh was to take him to see someone really old that could still do stuff while maintaining coolness. Secondly, I thought he would enjoy re–living old times, listening to the tunes. No dice.

"To tell you the truth, honey," he said to me over the din of voices in the Mullins Center, as we waited patiently in our seats for Dylan to take the stage,"I was more excited to see Natalie Merchant, but now I really don't mind seeing Bob Dylan. I'm sort of excited."

He didn't mind?

In the end of course he really enjoyed the concert. He was relieved to see people of all ages sitting around us, not just the gen–Xers I think he was expecting. He was able to chuckle at the second generation hippies down in front of us. He even mentioned that he thought he detected the smell of marijuana emanating from some people behind us. I let the conversation drop there, realizing that although my father was no loser the "good old days" weren't that he may have been in the late sixties, he still knows where it's at. Heck, he even got a little jiggy with it during "Like a Rolling Stone."

At times, though, attempts to bond over music can go awry, therefore widening the generation gap. When my mother presented me with some tickets for my friends and the whole fam to go see the Rolling Stones on their second (or third) final tour, I was nearly disowned for being more excited to see the opener, Lenny Kravitz.

"You like that crap?" my step–father so eloquently asked before the concert, as though liking anybody more than the Stones was akin to slaughtering kittens. I nodded and drowned my enthusiasm.

I finally did learn to appreciate the old guys though, especially now that they are endorsed by Tommy Hilfiger. Way to go Mick, nice wide legged jeans.

One of the most difficult things to do is to try to explain to a parent just what it is you are in fact listening to.

I made a huge mistake one day.

My mother and I got into my car, I turned the ignition and like a bolt of thunder from the sky Death Row's Greatest Hits erupted from the speakers. Naturally it couldn't have been a harmless bow–wow–wow from Snoop, but rather a full muthaf*g range of profanity. I fumbled to change the music, but even as Paul Simon eased into the second verse of "Me and Julio" my mother sat in the passenger seat, still stunned into silence and deathly pale. Eventually she asked me what the music was. Unfortunately when I responded with the name "Death Row" she became even more disturbed.

We now have rules when we get into my car and I make sure to pack some extra Janis Joplin, just in case.

So, what have I learned from all of this? Well, getting caught smoking a cigar at Jimmy Buffett never got me grounded, dead people can play guitars (Keith Richards!), my mom is funny when she's had too many Jell–O shots and my dad can identify the smell of marijuana. But, more importantly, (actually is there anything more important really than figuring out how Keith Richards still plays the guitar?) I have learned how to connect with my parents. I have learned that hipness is relative and we've all got it. Somewhere.

Wake up!

Miss Manners is the type of person I want to smack. Her sanctimonious advice makes me cringe. Who wants to be prim and proper about everything?

Okay, I never could be even if I tried. I've always been careless and sloppy about everything, and sometimes I'm a mean person. I chew with my mouth open. I sit with my legs open, and I'm not nice to ants.

Alexis Pushkar

If Queen Victoria came to Amherst, Massachusetts in the year 1999, she would realize that the age of chivalry is dead and social standards of behavior have lapsed. The Victorians did have ridiculous social standards — they covered the legs of pianos so that young men would not look at them and think about women's legs. (Gasp!) If my legs looked like a Steinway, I'd call up God and ask for a refund and an all expenses paid trip to an amputation clinic.

Although the Victorians were crazy, they had a point: it's nice to have some social standards of behavior which show respect for one's fellow man, woman, or child. Or professor.

I think Miss Manners would have a few words to say regarding the way students treat their professors. Students exhibit four types of rude behavior in large lecture classes, which are very common at UMass: they show up late, they pack up five minutes before the class is supposed to end, they talk during the lecture, and they uh, read a really great campus newspaper.

These behaviors show professors that students would rather be doing almost anything else — including belly dancing — and that students have no respect for the hard work that professors put into their careers and their lectures.

Think about it. Professors had to go to school for thirty years to even land the job that they have. They have spent their careers studying arcane pieces of minutia and arguing with each other about the exact location of conondents in a cladogram. They write large volumes of stuff with no pictures and sentences that are ten lines long with words like "heuristic" in them. Most of the world has no idea what they are talking about and no one cares.

So they land this professor job, and they have to put on a one–man show two or three times a week. They had better be entertaining because people in the audience often forget how much they pay per show since it doesn't come out of their pockets at the door. Professors have to write a script, gather the props and perform for an audience that would rather be watching "Dawson's Creek." My professors have to compete with the sexiness of James Van Der Beek and frankly they lose.

If they aren't entertaining, we leave, mentally or physically. We walk out the door. We surreptitiously do a crossword puzzle. We fall asleep. We daydream. We do homework for another class. We plan our weekends. We invent the electric beer maker.

I'm not proud of the fact that we do everything except pay attention to the lectures on our schedules. However, we should have more respect for our professors, no matter what we think about them personally.

Don't show up more than five minutes late. It's silly to show up to class forty minutes into the lecture. You should have saved yourself the trouble and stayed in bed the extra ten minutes. The last part of class is a washout anyway: you can't hear anything because people are busy packing up their bags.

Yeah, and don't pack up before he or she stops talking even if your next class is in Germany. Where the heck do you have to rush off to that you can't wait five minutes? If you run into a friend you take five minutes out to talk to them. You can spare five minutes to let the professor finish whatever earth–shattering point he or she was making. And so many of their ideas are earth–shattering.

Don't talk during lecture — you might as well go to the Bluewall and get your utterly wretched hot chocolate. Talking during lecture doesn't make you cool and rebellious. Remember, high school was a long time ago, and most of us have moved past that.

And only read the Ed/Op page of the Collegian under your desk. It's the best page and I'm sure if you get caught reading it, Professor Plum would be understanding and would say, puffing on his pipe, "Well, that's okay, kid. You see me after class, and I'll give you my notes." The crossword puzzle is not an acceptable way of passing your time, although I did spend one whole sophomore semester doing them during a particular class. But really, I was only cheating myself.

You might be thinking, "I hate all my professors. I don't give a flying fudgeman about respecting them." Maybe too many of them screwed you over, and you're bitter. I don't know about you, but I usually don't get screwed over until the end of the semester so I give my new professors the benefit of the doubt at the beginning. As I said, their lives are pitiful, and they need all the sympathy we can muster.

I need to say a few words about people who fall asleep in lecture. Since I have almost done it myself, I have sympathy for those who never seem to get enough sleep. I had a class last semester that was a slide show, and we always sat in the dark. All I have to say is: that professor asked for it.

Actually, I have done all the things that I just finished griping about. But it is rude and it's time we had some standards.

I'm sure Miss Manners would agree. She would say something like, "Miss Manners thinks that college students today need to respect their professors," and her ankles would be delicately crossed and her hands would be folded in her lap. She would be sitting up straight and her hair would be neatly combed.

Don't you just want to smack her?

Plight of a people: one classroom — one America

How come race comes into play when students apply to college? How come blacks and Latinos don't just do their work and score high on the SATs like everyone else? Why are they always complaining and using their race as an excuse? How can they accept a less "qualified" student of color over a "more" qualified white student? Isn't Affirmative Action discriminatory in nature?

These are some of the many concerns of white America.

I am going to walk you step by step through these questions and I will keep it simple.

How come race comes into play when students apply to college? Race comes into play at the college admissions level because race comes into play at the elementary level, the middle school level, and at the high school level. Students of color — in communities of color — attend elementary schools that suffer from lack of funding.

The consequences of lack of funding are: poor building conditions which are detrimental to a learning environment, lower teacher salaries that cannot attract top–notch teachers, out–of–date books and learning materials, poor or non– existent computer labs, no access to the Internet, large classrooms, little or no black history in their curriculum, not enough funding for field trips, and not enough funding for after–school programs.

Edgar Barros

How come blacks and Latinos don't just do their work and score high on the SATs like everyone else? Blacks and Latinos are not properly prepared to take the SATs. It isn't that we are stupid or less intelligent, some of us simply did not learn the material during the course of our twelve years in the public school system. We simply did not see a trigonometry problem before the SATs. We simply were not effectively taught how to decode and wrestle with word analogies. We simply were not effectively taught how to read and comprehend what we read. Do you understand what I am telling you? The only thing we ask is that our local public schools properly prepare us. That is it! The SAT is not an IQ test, it is a test of what you've been taught.

Why are they always complaining and using their race as an excuse? We are not complaining and making excuses, we are trying to let you know that we are getting the short end of the stick here. We do not prefer Affirmitive Action, we prefer equal access. We want equal access to equal education for our children. That is all we want.

"White America, you have the power to help make a change. I am personally asking you to come out and support us."

How can they accept a less "qualified" student of color over a "more" qualified white student? In response to this question, I ask you, "How can they provide a little white child with a better education than a little black or Latino child?" Come on folks, let's think logically and rationally now. This is not that complicated. There would be no need for Affirmative Action in college admissions if we had equal access to equal education.

Isn't Affirmative Action discriminatory in nature? Yes it is! And isn't sending our children to poor under funded schools discriminatory in nature? Yes it is! Affirmative Action is a band–aid to a great national wound. The attempt at trying to level off the playing field at the college level by implementing Affirmative Action practices in admission is a cop–out. The wound of racism and neglect has to be stitched up. That is the only solution. Provide our children with equal access to equal education from the time they are 3–years–old. This is the only solution. Until then, I guess we will have to trade one discriminatory act for another.

Until we stitch up the wound (equal access to equal education) we need the band–aid (Affirmative Action). If the band–aid is removed prematurely, blood will gush out of this wound at a deadly rate.

White America, you have the power to help make a change. I am personally asking you to come out and support us.

Money and politics

Our generation has been called apathetic over and over again when the subject of politics comes up. The fact that we don't vote is characterized by older generations as evidence that we "don't care" or worse yet, we care only about ourselves.

This is a vast oversimplification. It is true that we don't vote very often, but to say that this is evidence of apathy is to look only at the surface of a problem of tremendous depth. The reason we don't vote comes not out of apathy, but out of our of cynicism; not out of selfishness, but out of a fundamental frustration with the electoral system as a whole.

Jason Owens

Elections, in our generation's collective mind, a.) don't provide candidates that we approve of, and b.) do not accurately portray the agendas and policies that politicians will enact if elected. To us, it's a bunch of unlikable guys (mostly) who talk and talk without ever telling us what they're actually going to do if they get elected.

The reasons for the disjunct between voter and politician in the electoral process, while incredibly complex, can be summed up in three words: media, money, and marketing.

"The media," because politicians have transformed the medium of television into a delivery system of sound bytes, negative ads, and non–substantive talking heads. "Money," because corporate payoffs to election campaigns handcuff politicians in the range of topics they are willing to discuss. And "marketing," because politicians, once respected for thinking on their feet and spontaneous problem solving, now work tirelessly to isolate themselves from the public, putting forth a "persona" designed by marketing teams, often called "spin doctors."

The real reason Americans, and our generation in particular, don't vote is not a result of apathy, but of an intuitive knowledge of the ineffectiveness of the elective system itself. Why vote for one out of two candidates who a.) talk about the exact same things (except maybe one or two issues like abortion) and b.) aren't telling us anything about what they're going to do anyway. To vote is only to reaffirm the process — our presence in the system only serves to give it credibility when it doesn't deserve any.

One remedy to the problem would be revolution. We all know that's not very practical though, so one tries to look within the system for solutions. Here are a couple of issues that politicians often blow off in a suspiciously casual manner. They don't like to talk about them, and they'd prefer we didn't, either.

Term Limits: One of the complaints about American voters is that they like to blame Congress for not putting together cohesive plans to improve the country, but at the same time reward their own officials when they bring money into their respective region at the expense of the greater whole. It's often referred to as "pork", and it has to do with things like federal money being spent on highways a state doesn't need, but that bring money to a region.

Many politicians have made an art form of working this side of the system. They stay in office not because of insight or vision, but because they excel at ripping off the tax payers from the rest of the country by directing federal money into their own state.

Let's face it — we elect people because they bring in "pork." We can't seem to help it. If we admit it's a bad thing, why don't we do something to curb it? By limiting the careers of politicians who lack insight but excel at pork, we'd do just that. We might not be able to get as much excess federal money, but neither would the next state. We need new ideas, not professional rip–off artists. And this leads us into the next topic — one far more important than term limits.

Campaign Finance Reform: Here's the biggy. How can Congress impartially decide what to do with cigarette manufacturers when R.J. Reynolds donated $2.5 million to Republicans in the last elections? We wouldn't trust most politicians around our teenage sister, so do we really think they can rule on the group that paid for them to get into office without bias?

Republicans collect more from private corporations than Democrats. Not by much, but they still do. They say they can't afford to campaign without private contribution, but It is a lie. Democrats know this. They like the system just as much as Republicans, but find it convenient to say that they only need all the private money to keep up with Republicans. It's not as much of a lie, but it sure ain't the whole truth.

In short, politicians could greatly limit how much money they take from corporations. They really could. Why don't they? Quite simply, because they don't want to. If they did, they would have to answer to "the people".

We live in a representative democracy that represents corporate America. Our officials won't take broad steps for the overall good because they have a million responsibilities to public interest groups, corporations, and giant trade unions that make decisive action impossible. They are forced to work far harder at making campaign contributors happy than they can at improving the country. The system demands it.

We've got to figure out how to get campaign finance reform to the top of the public agenda. It may take a recession (yes, we'll have one eventually) to get people upset enough. Until we do, elections remain silly. They will continue to be absolutely pointless. Politicians say they need private contributions? No one even pays attention to most of their campaigns — why do they think they need $60 million to talk about nothing. If they'd just talk about something, we might just pay attention.

Yes, you're cynical, and no, politics don't appeal to you. But think — what if there was something you could do to make things better? Campaign reform would do it. Imagine politicians who could bravely initiate programs to better America. If they weren't slaves to they system they could. They really could. Right now, the system makes it impossible. If they could initiate good programs, then we could elect officials who would. The system just might work! It wouldn't solve everything, but man would it be a start.

Let's play ball

I'm a die–hard New York Yankees fan. (Hang on, friendly Red Sox fans — this is not what you think. I'm not here to gloat).

Growing up in Connecticut, I was bred on weekend trips to that Mecca in the Bronx, Yankee Stadium. Mickey Mantle and Joe DiMaggio proved to be the gods that my family and I pledged allegiance to. Complete with one of those obnoxious giant styrofoam hands, pin–striped jerseys, and eight year–old enthusiasm, I had an epiphany every time Rickey Henderson stole a base. Rooting for the Bronx Bombers since I was a mere zygote, baseball was my one true religion.

Margot A. Susca

So you think that I would be beaming with ecstatic joy, smiling with exuberant delight over the last Yankees' acquisition, Roger Clemens. Well, I'm not.

When the news was announced late last week of Clemens' deal with the Yankees I wanted to do what I always do when the Yanks screw over the rest of Major League Baseball.

"Can you imagine some corporate sponsor prostituting its logo across the retired jersey of Bobby Orr?"

I wanted to call all of my waiting–since–1918– faithful–Red Sox–fan friends and laugh, laugh, and keep laughing all the way to the World Series.

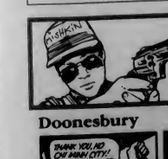
"First Babe Ruth and now this!" I would chuckle like a satisfied hyena. My friends' responses, scattered with hateful expletives, would have to be edited. But I never made the call.

After several years of careful philosophical pondering over the state of sports in America, I'm disgusted with this trade. The baseball strike of 1994 brought me close to the edge. This season's basketball strike brought me ever closer. But the Clemens situation is the proverbial straw that broke the camel's back. My gods finally fell from heaven and revealed themselves as the greedy evangelists that they truly are.

Sports is merely a microcosm of American society. Amherst is certainly no exception. Life has become a marketing disease with us as the afflicted patients. Our allegiance is often determined by watery 6–ounce beers. Marketing swallows most of our everyday lives.

Here in Amherst we are finally settling back into our normal semester routines after the disruption of winter break. In our fuzzy wool sweaters, latest version of the cargo pants, and more fleece than an Upstate New York petting zoo, we go about conducting our daily business. But I must ask the question, "have we become walking billboards?"

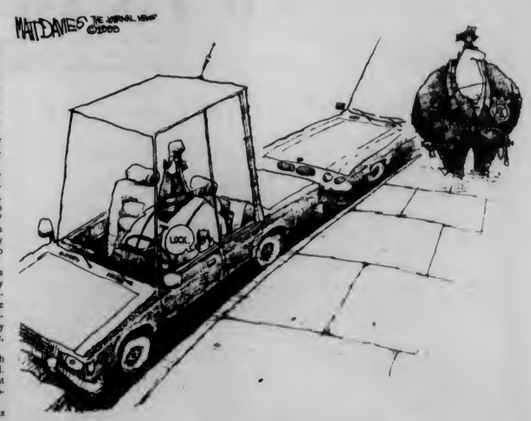
Down the sleeve, across the chest, and emblazoned on our hats and mittens, companies offer us their logos. We pay enormous sums of money to clothing companies so that we can advertise for them. Walking across campus on any given morning we are inundated with the latest names in trendy gear. From our feet to the tops of our heads we are completely exploited. Advertising and marketing are unavoidable but must we offer ourselves into the already unequal formula? I guess these companies need us to do their advertising for them on the streets of Main Street USA because they are too busy paying star athletes.



Michael Jordan, the best basketball player in the history of the game, invades my living room hocking everything from batteries to long distance. I cannot imagine what would happen if Jordan had tried to live on his $28 million salary alone. The greed and misplaced loyalty that have corrupted my beloved New York Yankees have corrupted our American society as a whole.

Can you imagine some corporate sponsor prostituting its logo across the retired jersey of Bobby Orr? This marketing epidemic is the same phenomenon that took away the Boston Garden and gave us the antiseptic, uninviting yellow of the Fleet Center. So maybe you couldn't see Larry Bird perfectly from every seat in that heavenly old Boston institution, but the history was there. The memories were there... and Fleet Bank wasn't.

So, Red Sox fans: when Clemens faces the crowd at Fenway dressed in the gray away uniform and you're in the bleachers, remember that there is nothing quite like an "insert name of big corporate beer sponsor here" sign to drown your sorrows.



For now, I've got two words for George Steinbrenner: Florida Marlins. I guess one thing is for sure — money really can buy happiness, but it also takes the integrity out of the game.

Losing Faith

I lost my faith today. Not in a person or a thing, but in an institution, in a belief. A belief that states that Residence Life, in other words, RAs, RDs, and ARDs, can make a difference, and could improve the quality of student life. If you ask me why, I would tell you that you wouldn't understand. If you ask me how, I would tell you that it doesn't matter. All that I can tell you is what, and hope that you come to an understanding of how and why therein.

Clif Hirtle

Essentially it the loss of some of the best co–workers/RAs that I have ever had the pleasure of working in which I state that Residence Life will never achieve its potential in improving the quality of student life here at UMass. Specifically, I am referring to a situation in which three long–time members to the UMass Residence Life Program were terminated for admitting to smoking marijuana in the dormitories.

The problem here is that even if the police had not misrepresented themselves, even if they did not verbally derogate those involved, even if they did not confiscate only a minute quantity of marijuana, and even if two other members of staff did not resign as a result of the situation, there would still be grounds for discontent.

The individuals involved were of the highest caliber that Residence Life could ever ask for and while the critics may faithfully adhere to the principle that the rules are the only thing that holds a system together, I disagree. I think it is the people that hold a system together. Without the people there is no caring, no respect, no laughter, no creativity, no innovation, no support, no friends, no memories, and no means for improving the system whatsoever.

Moreover, I think what lies so fundamental to this discontent is the fact that in similar alcohol–related incidents, Residence Life staff who did not take their job with nearly as much seriousness have been at least given the option to resign, rather than be simply terminated outright. And anybody that has ever been let go from a job knows that there is a huge difference between resigning and being terminated.

The individuals involved in this situation have been made to feel as if they caused the gravest of injustices against their co–staff, which, regardless of its truth or untruth, is irrelevant to the actual administrative response. The entire occurrence reeks from a lacking of professionalism.

Also, consider the possibility that when a system such as Residence Life becomes so uncompromising, so institutionalized, so utterly blind to the repeated, unconditional efforts of its members in favor of simply retaining a baseline, minimum consistency, then it has lost all potential to adapt and improve. I simply cannot accept the premise that places an individual who fulfills merely the minimum of his/her expectations and who contributes nothing beyond what is required to improve the quality of student/staff life as more valuable or more essential than the individual who goes out of his/her way, stays after hours, raises the standard, brings a group together, acts as a friend, knows how to laugh, and embodies the essence of a job simply because the latter breaks one simple rule. Particularly when the very law that caused these people to lose their jobs — the law stating that the use of marijuana is Illegal — may not even exist in U.S. or UMass law five to six years from now.

I find it also only necessary to ask why it is such an inexcusable crime to be caught in the terrible act of being human? And why it is that violent, noisy, alcohol– intoxicated students are given more rights to privacy, less priority by police, and thus more reinforcement to engage in their behavior than their more passive and less disrupgtful substance–smoking neighbors?

Four years of UMass dorm life informs me that if we take residents simply on the basis of their effect on the surrounding community, regardless of all our cultural stereotypes and biases, alcohol–related disruptions are far greater than the latter and there is simply no basis for comparison. But that is another matter all together.

The point is that my co–workers were and will continue to be the inspiration by which my repeated efforts as an RA were and are rewarded. To push oneself incessantly forward, to test the boundaries of the creativity or to become a role model to one's residents is not something that is done for material reward or institutional recognition, but for the honor and dignity that is attained only by attempting to raise oneself up and to become an equal with the more prominent and inspirational of one's colleagues.

And to say that any hero, in real life or fiction, does not make mistakes is ludicrous. My co–staff made the mistake of being too human, too interested in the experiences of life, and for this, they were not even given the opportunity to leave with the dignity of resignation. They were merely "terminated." This of all things to the individuals who had invested their entire heart and soul into the cause of improving student and staff life.

I will never forget the expressions, the emotional pain and defamation brought upon the most creative, thoughtful, and supportive colleagues I have ever know by the institutional blindness and ignorance of the "individual" that is so common here at UMass To see such long–time contributors to the system so easily and systematically ousted from it is enough to remove all faith I have in it. And to place ourselves on the bastion of imagined perfection and to judge the actions of others as wrong merely because we are not involved, merely because traditions tells us that something is bad, or merely because we cannot face up to the possibility that an entire system or institution is wrong, is simply too easy of a way out.

It is the betrayal of our everyday heroes and the embodiment of all that we hold sacred merely in order to maintain the status quo. I will not do it. I will relinquish my faith in the system long before I will relinquish my faith in my heroes.

Clif Hirtle is a UMass student.

Help wanted

These days, anyone driving down Route 9 is likely to see a dark cloud looming overhead near the Amherst/Belchertown border. It appears over my house every time I review the "Help Wanted" ads. Let me explain. I am a member of possibly the most frightened group of students on campus: I'm an English major in my final semester.

I've looked into graduate schools I can't afford, and realized that I must work for a while in order to put myself through. And so, I have made the trek to the Career Center, checked out job search boards on the Internet, and paged through the Classifieds in both the Globe and the Advocate (admittedly, when reading the more boring ads, I'm sometimes distracted by the naughty Personals in the latter part, but who isn't?) Each of these endeavors has resulted in frustration. Some of my fellow English majors — including two of my three housemates — have told me that they feel the same way. It's come to the point where I can ratify the top three reasons why I'm not qualified for any job, a talent which is sure to impress any employer:

Jennifer–Lynn Jennings

The Bilingual Angle: Under the language heading of my resume are the words "Reading, writing, and speech of Italian." Which means: "Not Fluent in Italian." I was exempt from taking a language here by virtue of the fact that I learned to say "Ayre la finestra, per favore," in high school (by the way, that means "Open the window, please).

I have learned to translate and speak Middle English, which is definitely a marketable skill. After all, I can start off every cover letter with, "When that April with its showres soote..."

The Experience Angle: Almost every Classified I've encountered has asked for 5–5 years experience in the advertised field. What about us soon–to–be–graduates? Don't we deserve a shot? Why not recruit those of us who can successfully complete a close reading of an Emily Dickinson poem?

On second thought, don't answer that.

The Teacher Angle: I admire the members of the teaching profession. They have taken on a most arduous task: to educate and mold the minds of the young. However, I have absolutely no interest in taking part in it.

I think that there has only been one time in my entire life that my statement, "I am an English major," wasn't followed by the question, "So you want to teach?" At that time I collapsed into tears, birds chirped a glorious chorus, and a beam of light shined down from the heavens.

The answer is no. I don't want to teach, and please don't be patronizing when I say I want to write. Thank you.

I have pursued an education in English because I love the written word and what it conveys, and I don't regret my decision one bit. Every lota of literary criticism I've studied, every passage I've memorized, and every poem I've agonized over before a workshop, has only enhanced my love and respect for the field. Even so, there's a part of me that recoils when I hear, "But English is such a versatile field! You can do anything!"

I feel jealous when my friends in SOM go off to interviews with companies recruiting on–campus (hey, why doesn't Random House ever come here?) I can't help myself. I'll venture that other Arts and Science majors feel the same way. So please, be gentle when you ask what we're doing after graduation. Above all, we are frightened and sensitive breed.

Sick of it All, Eminem & Teletubbies

Eminem's latest release doesn't measure up to its full potential.

CALL TO ARMS
Sick of it All
Fat Wreck Chords

New York hardcore act Sick of It All have released their fifth LP on the independent record label Fat Wreck Chords. Entitled Call to Arms, the fifteen-plus tracks on this CD should definitely satisfy long-time fans of the band as well as newcomers. Although I am more of a metal fan, with only the occasional hardcore bands passing through my collection (vision of Earth Crisis), this release nonetheless had me hooked. The vocals by Lou Koller are strong and aggressive, but almost never unintelligible. The music is also very tight and the guitar, bass and Armand Majidi's drums all sound crystal clear. The lyrics are very accessible; you won't find yourself scratching your head trying to interpret the meaning of the songs, but they are all easy to relate to and are intelligent. The topics range from non-conformity to self-loathing, but there are many positive messages to be found in such uplifting tracks as "The Future is Mine" and "Hindsight."

At just over a half-hour from beginning to end, Call to Arms throws a lot at you in a short amount of time, but after repeated listenings you come to appreciate the complete absence of flabby areas or filler songs. Every track on this album is a winner and it's getting harder and harder it find CDs like that nowadays. Some favorites like "Potential for a Fall" and "Martin" are the album at its best, combining smart songwriting with great riffs and plenty of aggression. Those looking for heaviness need look no further than the aforementioned "Potential for a Fall" which gas a killer bass line from Craig Ahead, as well as "Falling Apart" and the awesome closer "(Just a) Patsy." A great riff by guitarist Pete Koller opens up the album on the track "Let Go" which is one of a few tracks such as "Guilty" and "Pass the Buck" that clock in at a little over a minute and should please hardcore fans with their short and aggressive style. I urge fans of all types of aggressive and heavy music to give this excellent album a listen, and not miss out on the first truly great release of 1999. A (Michael Delano)

THE SLIM SHADY LP
Eminem
Aftermath

Dropping an album amidst a whirlwind of hype can be a difficult task. However, Eminem's eyepopping publicity has transpired rather recently. In fact, before the "My Name Is" video exploded on MTV, Marshall Mathers was subtly advertising his Slim Shady EP, which was promoted as more of an underground record. His guest appearances on Rawkus Records squadron songs like "5 Star General" left listeners eager for more of his clever, masochistic lyrics. However, The Slim Shady LP did little justice to his unquestionable skill.

Eminem breaks lyrical barriers in many ways (and it has nothing to do with race) but the content of his songs leave listeners both amused and disturbed. Although his thoroughly thought-out rhymes often sting the ear drum and incite repeated listening, this is barely a hip-hop album. Its pitch black comedy is so thick and relentless, he could aptly draw comparisons with Andrew Dice Clay rather than say, Cannabis. Eminem's innovative sound effects and antics during his rhymes enhance his lyricism and augment his comedic style, but his often tin-tap beats hardly create a sufficient background. Consequently, numerous songs such as "Cum On Everybody," "My Fault" and "I'm Shady" are ridden with corny choruses and weak production which ultimately detract from Mathers' credibility. So if you were expecting a variety of wicked rhymes and sinister beats like that of "Just Don't Give a Fuck" and "My Name Is," the pickens are slimmer than Shady himself. The album's finest

Playing at Mountain Farms Four Theaters

There's only one word to describe 8mm: dark. Really really dark. Of course, I guess that's to be expected for a movie about pornography and snuff films in particular. The movie manages to convey the biting eeriness and gruesome terror of the underground porn world without having full access to all the necessary imagery. Needless to say, converting X-rated material into the standard R format is a difficult task, but the movie does it well, in a disturbingly eye-catching way. Because of this phenomena the movie is restrained, perhaps exceedingly so, allowing its simple, calculated plot to unfold methodically.

A rich, widowed heiress has just hired private detective Tom Welles to discover the truth behind one homemade film. On the film, a young girl appears to be brutally slashed to death by a masked maniac. Despite his reluctance to believe the authenticity of any snuff, Welles takes the case. His quest to find the missing girl leads him to Max, a tour guide of sorts, to the porn world. Welles must wade through the dark sea of hardcore pornography to discover who made the tape and how to deliver justice, before they find him.

In the tradition of Seven, 8mm walks the thin line between simply offending the audience with inflammatory, appalling imagery and questioning the morality of our society in which this material circulates. Luckily, director Joel Schumacher does a relatively good job of tying the "freakish" world to everyday reality. From the very beginning, there is a distinct sense of pervading darkness and evil surrounding the movie.

The always dark-clad Tom Welles slinks around the shadows of equally dark, urban shanties — invisible to would-be intruders. His house is gloomy and dismal with seemingly a lone lamp providing even the smallest hint of light. The heirers' estate, to which he must travel, is remote and isolated, lurking in the woods.

Tom Welles is the epitome of normalcy, with his wife and baby daughter, entering a frightening, foreign world. The gritty, grotesque snuff film is only his first taste of this underground world. The grinding clip-clop sound of that eight-millimeter tape soon comes to haunt him and provides the sinister motif for the rest of the movie.

Again, without all the graphic material, there is a great reliance on acting, especially from Nicolas Cage, to convey the full effects of the films. Cage gives a solid, but not breath- taking, performance. He winces in anguish at the horrific sights before him, as if the knives were transcending the screen to pierce his body. We can feel his disbelief and uneasiness gradually build into resentment and fuming anger, which Cage does well. Still, he lacks the silent intensity of a Morgan Freeman to completely "sell" his quest for motive role.

moment comes on "Rock Bottom" where Mathers exquisitely relates the trials of living poor. The track's haunting beat echoes as Eminem flexes his dark (but not really profane) lyrics. Yet overall, Slim Shady is an underachiever that fails to live up to its hype. C+ (David Katzoff)

METASEXUAL
Joydrop
Tommy Boy

Do we need more bands that want to sound like Curve, Garbage, or even a harder version of Blondie? Joydrop's Metasexual is unmoving, and uninteresting. Generic in every sense of the word, lead vocalist Tara Slone lacks the energy, and sultriness of Shirley Manson and Toni Halliday, and also lacks the personality of Deborah Harry. With their edgy (but overly polished) guitars, crazy loops, and hooks that don't manage to catch anything, Joydrop offers us nothing we haven't seen before. Only "Breakdown," the album's third track manages to capture interest. Such a shame they played all their cards so early in the game. D+ (Kevin Monahan)

TELETUBBIES: THE ALBUM
The Teletubbies
Kid Rhino

Despite circulating rumors, there are no satanic messages to be found in this album when played backwards. However, you may hear Tinky Winky covering a Judy Garland song if you listen closely enough. Yes, it's time for Teletubbies; featuring the single "Teletubbies Say 'Eh-Oh'!" which held the number one spot on the UK charts just a little longer than it should have around the Christmas of '97.

The highlights of the album include "Animals," "Trees" and "Clouds," long instrumental Robert Miles-like ballads that soothe even the most fussy listener. The album's writer and performer Andrew McCrorie-Shand has created a body of songs that is as enjoyable for adults as it is for children. "Puddle Dance" starts the collection with hyper enthusiasm that ebbs and flows to its calmer finale with "Lullaby".

A review of this album would not be complete without alluding to the endless possibility for innuendo that it affords its adult audience. For example, in the song "Dirty Knees," why are La-La's knees so dirty? And why is Po dirty all over? These are questions that will plague us all.

The hologram on the cover hints to the psychedelic pleasures that await inside dressed in plush suits of the most vivid colors. The creators must be aware of the Teletubbies' popularity in the rave scene. The down side is that like the television show, the songs can be repetitive at times. While the Teletubbies may be an acid lover's dream, they are definitely a speed freak's nightmare. A- (Anna Feder)

Frontline Assembly releases an album of re-mixes with Monument.

MONUMENT
Frontline Assembly
Roadrunner

Monument is an excellent release from one of the bands that helped define industrial music. This collection of the group's best work from their most productive period (1989-1993) consists of mostly re-mixes of the most popular songs from the albums Gashed Senses and Crossfire, Caustic Grip, Tactical Neural Implant, The Blade and Millennium.

During the early days of industrial, Frontline Assembly created a distinctly European sound, unlike fellow natives of Vancouver, Canada, and named it Skinny Puppy. While Skinny Puppy's music was dark and violent, Frontline Assembly went on to influence the electronic-dance house scene. Monument features re-mixes of old songs under new titles, and some familiar titles as well. Frontline Assembly have prided themselves on being melodic and hummable while at the same time being bone-crushing and visceral. "Big Money (Remix)" includes some awkward and creative sampling, and the rest of the album provides the kind of sonic whiplash expected from one of the front-runners of the industrial genre. "Virus (Cauterized Mix)" is one of the album's best tracks, complete with Bill Leeb's uncompromising and menacing vocals. Although the album has its slow, and predictable points, Monument wins over the listener. Despite its flaws, dance music this aggressive is hard to pull off. B+ (K.M.)

JAWBREAKER
London

The soundtrack for a movie that has been referred to as a 90s Heathers, is surprisingly original and spirited. Filled with a lot of great pop songs you'll probably never hear on the radio, this album meets a difficult challenge: poppy and light, but never shallow or coy.

Imperial Teen shows up twice on the album offering up two of its catchiest tracks: "Yoo Hoo," and "Water Boy," both capture the teenage girly viscousness that Jawbreaker intends to portray. But instead of feeling like you just spent three hours at Claire's Boutique in your local mall, you'll feel like you just sneaked into an underground punk club. If only I were that cool in high school...

Other highlights of the album include "I See," by Letters to Cleo. "I'll rectify myself to all the things I thought were real/ Or I'll lock the bedroom door and simply stay at home," sings Letters to Cleo lead singer Kay Hanley, just one example of the great lyrics which are easily missed, drowned in the playful melodies that color this album. The biggest shocker on the soundtrack was the inclusion of the song "Rock You Like A Hurricane," by the early 80s kooks the Scorpions. It kind of flustered me to have to put away my pink Manic Panic, and take out my Rave Ultra hold hairspray, on such a moment's notice. A- (Julie Fialkow)

Surprisingly, however, Joaquin Phoenix, who plays Cage's sidekick Max, provides an amazing dose of believability. In addition to being funny, his story of "Hollywood dreams gone awry" provides a certain, gnawing realism to the movie. Max is smart and talented, yet he got caught up in the world's dark underbelly; this failed success story, one of wasted life, is perhaps scarier than the underworld itself.

Still, 8mm is a long time coming. The movie seems like a lot of build up and a lot of excess for what turns out to be a not so resounding climax. The movie labors to reach the action, muddles about for a while, and fizzles out. Perhaps, the problem is that the movie, in essence, a suspense film, tries to become an action flick. Somehow, the chase scenes and the near death scrapes detract from the realization that evil can and does effect normal, everyday people — the climax proposed by the movie.

8mm does manage to get its message across eventually, which in itself is an achievement. Technically, the movie is well made; it's just not all that engaging. The hard core images are undoubtedly gripping, but the rest of the movie is lacking the same intensity. More focus on the characters and less on the porn industry would have made more sense and would have made a better film. As it is, 8mm is very dark, but does not live up to the greatness of Seven. B-

Dance.

"I had nothing to lose when [the stress fracture occurred] with about nine to 10 games left, so I felt I might as well play [on it] until it breaks," Clarke said. "That's the attitude that I had because I wanted to go out and win. I knew I wasn't having the best year, but I made a commitment from the beginning to start it off, and I'm going to finish it."

He is a competitor in every true sense of the word. As a high school star at St. Raymond's in the Bronx, he was one of the most explosive players to emerge from the New York area. As a freshman at UMass, he was the second Minuteman off the bench for John Calipari's Final Four team. The 1995-96 season also marked his first major collegiate bout with an injury — a broken foot.

"I can't use [injuries] as an excuse," Clarke said. "I've still had the opportunity to go out there and play. I'm a little slower than I used to be. I'm more hurt, but I can't use that as an excuse. I'm still out there playing 40 plus minutes. I've just got to make the best of my opportunities."

By his sophomore year, Clarke had become a dangerous scorer in Bruiser Flint's new three-guard offense. When his junior season began, the team was finally his. He had passed his two-year course under the tutelage of former UMass guards Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso.

"They just told me to keep [the spirit] going, play as hard as you can and get [the other] guys fired up," the senior guard said of his predecessors. "[They told me to] go out there and be a leader, and do the things we used to do, just carry it over and make sure these guys understand that."

And this season has become Clarke's opportunity to pass his knowledge on to the younger members of the back court. But he's still stubborn, and isn't quite ready to pass the proverbial torch until his playing days are finally over. But that doesn't mean he hasn't taken a stab at coaching during practice — at least not one large enough to completely disrupt Flint.

"I'll leave that up to Bruiser. It's something I'll probably think about doing later down the line," said Clarke, who speculated on a future coaching career. "For now, I feel like I've got a lot of basketball left. I still want to play. When I feel like it's time for me to give it up, then I'll probably get into coaching, and [Bruiser] will probably be the first person I turn to to help me out. I'll probably come back and stay local."

Some people also like to compare Clarke to Flint. Both have a similar charisma for dealing with the media, both smile as if they're biting their tongues, and both aren't afraid to point out instances in which the team captain, Clarke, doesn't play well.

"Some people say we look alike, some people say we smile alike," Clarke said. "A lot of people say everything. I don't know, but he's a great guy and I love him a lot."

It's true. Clarke does love his coach very much. He loves the fact that he is given the opportunity to lead his team. He loves the fact that he's allowed to serve as a spokesperson of sorts. But he really loves the idea that Flint holds a high degree of respect for him — respect which allows Clarke to make his own decision on how he wants to end his collegiate career.

But try competing in a Final Four your freshman season. Then try becoming you team's most clutch player by your junior year. Then try breaking your foot before the final stretch of your senior season.

And if you'd like, try watching your final games for UMass from the bench.

Charlton Clarke thought about trying that last one... and then he reconsidered when he found out just how much he actually resembles a coach.

"Toni has good offense and defense skills, he has been logging a lot of minutes for us and he's got to work on his strength a little bit, but his play making and how he sees the ice is terrific," Mallen said.

Randy Drohan has also been a presence on the ice but most recently Drohan has been scoring points with most notably — his late goal against Providence which helped pull the Minutemen within striking distance.

"Randy Drohan has done a good job handling the puck with patients and he is tough. He shoots the puck well and I think he's done a really good job for us," Mallen said.

Chris Brannen despite having only four points a goal and three assists, has been spectacular. He has been strong defensively and has stayed out of the box in big situations. He has only received 14 penalties in the 32 games played, making him one of the six who has played in all of UMass' games.

"Chris Brannen has played very, very well on a lot of nights. Early in the year he was just trying to pick up the pace of the game. He is one of the youngest kids on the team and he has done a great job," Mallen said of Brannen.

Brannen the Brampton, Ont. native has always concentrated more on the defensive aspect of the game.

"That's always been my style, stay back on D and take care of your own end first and if you then happen to jump in the offensive rush and pick up a point, great, but defensemen's job is to take care of your own end first," Brannen said.

Justin Shaw has played in 17 games, although he hasn't thus far tallied any points this season, he has logged some valuable minutes of experience with many different defensemen.

"Justin Shaw has been injured a lot this year but he has great size and he's really learning a lot about how to play defense this year from the coaching he's received and he will improve a lot over the next year," Mallen said.

The youth on D helped lead the Minutemen back to the Hockey East playoffs, but the future of UMass hockey is even brighter due to the fact that the Minutemen will be returning the entire defensive unit.

"We did a good job this year with four freshman, and Joey is not even a true sophomore, he has only played a year and a half. Next year we're all going to have that extra year of experience, we'll be that much better. It has to be a big confidence builder for all of us," Brannen said.

■ hoops

and if you fight through the fatigue, then you've got a chance at winning basketball games... it's about focus."

But Flint is not the only one with aspirations for the Big Dance. Senior captain Charlton Clarke is also hoping that the clock won't strike midnight on his team.

"Cinderella is the key word. That's our new name," he said. "Every game we play from now on is a must-win situation. We've got a lot of basketball left. It should be senior night every night, and that's the approach we've got to take into Philly," said Clarke.

Despite losing a number of games to less-than-reputable opponents, the Minutemen have seemed to wear the glass slipper against their highly-touted foes. Victories over (then) No. 15 Kansas, A-10 West second seed Xavier, and No. 24 Temple, as well as a 59-51 barn-burner against No. 1 Connecticut have characterized this UMass squad as a team which has an uncanny ability to play great against great teams, and limp against everyone else.

Although Flint would like to build upon the major upsets that his Minutemen have earned during the regular campaign, he is well aware of the fact that the conference tournament has produced many different results in the past.

"We've always beaten teams in the regular season, then lost to them in the playoffs since I've been the coach," Flint, a third-year coach, said. "Last year we beat GW in the regular season and lost to them in the playoffs. The year before that we did the same thing."

The only UMass meeting of the year with the Dukes resulted with a 69-55 Minutemen rout on Jan. 3 at the Mullins Center. Although the lowest seed in the entire conference tournament, Duquesne will try to catch UMass off guard, perhaps as other A-10 clubs like Fordham, La Salle, and St. Bonaventure had done during the regular season.

"Duquesne going to be ready to play," Flint said. "We just have to take it game to game. We've got the Duquesne first, that's all I'm really worried about. Let's beat Duquesne first, and then we'll talk about the next one."

If the Minutemen beat the Dukes as expected, they will meet Xavier in the second round. If they can upset the Musketeers for the second time this year, then they will likely have a rematch with Temple in the semi-final. George Washington and Rhode Island hold the top two seeds, and fourth periods.

Yesterday's game did little to provide solid answers to the UMass coaching staff about its goaltending situation. Chris Campolettano played the first half of the contest, turning back 11 Holy Cross shots. Brian Soper was in net for the third, when he stopped five shots, and Tom Gilligan only had to make one save in the fourth.

"We're still not sure," Cannella said referring to the situation. "[Campolettano] got the nod today and he'll probably get the nod on Saturday. But I'm happy they're all competing and they all could play today."

Saturday, the Minutemen will travel to take on Cornell, a team UMass hasn't faced since the 1991 season. And the Minutemen aren't resting on their laurels with that game only three days away.

"I think coach will do a good job of getting us focused," Morley said. "He started talking about Cornell as soon as we got into the locker room."

Cannella agreed that the focus must now be on the Big Red.

"It's nice to get a game like this to open. But we get right back into it this weekend with a huge game for us," he said.

PHILADELPHIA — For an encore, the Atlantic 10 Conference will settle for three teams in the NCAA tournament.

Coming off a year when five A-10 teams made the field of 64, the conference had four teams in the preseason Top 25 — No. 7 Temple, No. 17 Xavier, No. 23 Rhode Island and No. 24 Massachusetts. Hopes were high for the league's best season ever.

But when the conference tournament opens today, only four teams have winning records and none are ranked in the Top 25.

"Is the league down?" asked Fordham coach Nick Macarchuk. "I guess you're going to have to say that if we had five teams going to the NCAAs last year, it's hard to maintain that success year after year."

George Washington (19-7), Temple (19-9) and Xavier (20-9) appear headed to the NCAA tournament, while Rhode Island (17-12) needs to do well in the league tournament to stand a chance of getting in. At this point in the season, though, George Washington coach Tom Penders isn't about to quibble with rankings. He just wants a chance to keep playing.

"It's the time of year when coaches don't want to be expected to do well," Penders said.

George Washington, with 5-foot-4 point guard Shawnta Rogers (20.7 points and 6.9 assists per game) leading the way, is one of the favorites to gain an automatic NCAA berth by winning the A-10 tournament.

Women's water victors

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

After only one weekend of action, the cries are already echoing from across college water polo:

"Break up the Minutewomen!"

The Massachusetts women ranked No. 7 nationally in preseason polls and opened the '99 campaign with three big wins at the Villanova Invitational this past weekend. The Minutewomen disposed of No. 12 Michigan by a score of 9- 2 in the opener, then drubbed Salem-Teikyo 16-3 before closing out the tourney with a 12-6 win over the host Wildcats.

The Maroon and White showed incredible versatility and depth over the three matches, as 10 different women tallied goals for UMass. The biggest factor, undoubtedly, was the defense.

"Team defense was the key this weekend," said coach Dan McOsker. "Our team came out strong, and got better as the tournament went on."

The vaunted UMass "front and lanes" D allowed the Wolverines of Michigan only nine shots on goal in Saturday's match, seven of which were stopped by goalkeeper Dana Sinkwich. The freshman from California also turned away seven Villanova shots and six scoring attempts by Salem-Teikyo on the weekend.

"Dana blocked a lot of hard, tough shots," said junior Laurie Edwards, who notched two goals during the tourney. "Any time a team scores less than six points against us, there's a 99 percent chance we'll come out on top."

Junior co-captains Katie Grogan and Claudia Clement provided leadership as well as offensive punch for UMass, combining for nine goals in the three contests. Clement's hat trick against Michigan helped the Minutewomen stay undefeated (3-0 all-time) against the Wolverines.

"We were a little nervous at first, knowing that all eyes were on us," said the Guam native, referring to the heightened expectations brought on by last year's brilliant 30-6 campaign. "But then right from the start, we came together."

Facing Salem-Teikyo for the first time ever, UMass was all about the Megans, as freshmen Megan Perry and Megan Thompson paced the team with three goals each. The Minutewomen's best offensive output of the tourney also saw key contributions from junior two-meter Marci Hupp, sophomore Katie Mayer, and freshman Anne Detloff, who each tallied a pair of goals. Junior Lyndsay Crenshaw provided great passing and defense from the field position as well.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Junior co-captain

Ohio native Hupp used the Nova match as her personal showcase, scoring a monumental six goals. An early 3-0 lead in that match prompted Coach McOsker to test the team's depth by pulling his starters. The second unit proved just as tenacious, as goals by sophomores Erin Hillier and Sarah Newell bolstered the cushion.

"We found out then that we're much deeper than even we thought," said McOsker, who has the luxury of going to underclassmen Alexa Olsen, Vanessa Solis, Karina Zarins, and Scarlet Ray off the bench. Sinkwich will be backed up in goal by Texan Chrissy Richardson.

Despite their seemingly flawless performance over the weekend, some players still saw room for improvement in the Maroon and White's game.

"A lot of things that typically take time, like communication, were great from the start," said Clement. "However, Coach McOsker did complain that our counter- attack wasn't quite there."

Ironically, a silver lining can even be found in the team's weaknesses, as a lack of transition led to better attacking and more scoring in the set offense.

Coming off their best season ever, the Minutewomen may have set even loftier goals for themselves than expected. While simply duplicating last year's Eastern Championship an eighth-place National showing would seem like enough, Coach McOsker and several of his players envision going even further in '99.

"This team has all the tools," said McOsker. "There's no doubt that we'll be as good, if not better, than last year's group."

"We're excited now, but wait a couple weeks," said Clement. "We'll be ten times better."

Women's volleyball attracts new recruits

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts coach Bonnie Kenny announced recently that two student-athletes signed National Letters of intent to play for the Massachusetts women's volleyball team next year, while attending UMass.

The two signees, Clare Baxter a 6-0 middle blocker from Tampa, Fla., and Nitia Small, a 5-11 right side/outside hitter from Los Angeles, Calif. will be looked upon to fill some of the few holes that the Minutewomen have for the upcoming season.

The Minutewomen have all their players returning from last season including co-captains Jill Meyers and Kari Hugancamp. They will also return middle blockers Rebecca Hasson and Celia Wiste along with freshmen Lauren Vander Veen. Heather Holtsberg will be expected to improve on her stellar freshman campaign as the setter. The Minutewomen can also count on contributions from Lymarie Lovett and Jennifer Drennan.

"They are going to add a lot of depth, but we are coming along real nicely. We have some good experience returning, and that's the first time in the program that we have had that, but I think they will add major contributions and depth," Kenny said. "We have time to bring them along, but they don't have to be impact players right away, if they are it's a bonus."

The two new signees will provide depth at two positions for the Minutewomen. Baxter helped lead her Florida high school to a state championship in 1996 and 1997, while being named first team All-State and All-Area selection in 1997. She was also chosen as two-time all district. Baxter also competed for a Tampa Juniors club team, which won the 1998 Kaepa Mideast Tournament 17-Club Championship.

"Clare played on a very good club team and a really good high school team. She has trained with one of the best juniors coaches, with Randy D'Agustino," Kenny said. "Clare needs to get strong and she'll be a good player, she will play middle and outside, but she has the potential to help us right away."

Small participated in basketball and track and field as well as playing volleyball at Campbell Hall. She was a second team all-league selection as a senior. Small also competed for a club team in Los Angeles.

"She is a new volleyball player. She is a tremendous athlete. And I don't want to compare her to Dionne Nash, You earn that kind of respect. But Natia has the physical attributes that Dionne had, and if she works as hard as Dionne, she has the potential to be very good," Kenny said.

After starting out slow (2-7) and then finishing off strong (13-8) the Minutewomen have many reasons to look forward to better results in 1999-2000.

The Downside of home schooling

Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Someone in a position of authority is likely to call upon you to lend assistance, especially where a minor mystery is concerned.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You're going to want to do things very much your own way today, and you're not likely to brook any opposition. Avoid becoming overly defensive.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You will soon recognize the signs of being "in transition" at this time. Today, you can take the first step toward a major change.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You're likely to learn more about a friend today than you had anticipated, but there will be no reason to question the relationship. Share a secret!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Progress may be slow today, but steady. You will have to be patient, for any tendency toward rushing forward should be curbed as soon as you recognize it.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You're most likely in for a long day, and you'll want to pace yourself. You needn't try to tackle your multiple responsibilities all at once.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may disagree with a close friend and co-worker on the next step to take. Your plans are nearing fruition, but there is time for compromise.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You can have a great deal of fun today, thanks to hard work put in earlier in the week. Someone is likely to call on you for a favor during the evening hours.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You're in a fine position to lend a hand to someone else today, but you will want to be sure that you're helping out in your own unique fashion.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — This is a good day to consider a future investment with time or money. Consider your current position, and assess the risks realistically.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You can advance your own creative techniques in imaginative ways today. Those around you will be surprised at the dramatic rise in your energy.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You may be slowed somewhat today by a technical difficulty that will require some quick learning on your part. Later, you can increase the pace.

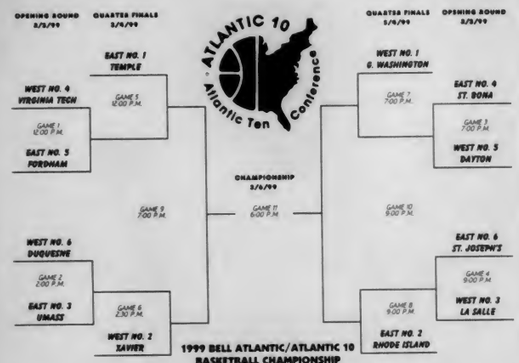
Men's hoop faces Bonnies in A–10s

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

A tumultuous regular season has finally ended for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team. And looking back, the end may not be such a bad thing afterall.

That's not because the Minutemen endured a disappointing 13–15 campaign. It's because they can finally put it behind them and look toward the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament, which begins today at 2:00 p.m. (WMUA 91.1) for the No. 5 East seed UMass, when it meets West No. 6 Duquesne at the Philadelphia Spectrum.



Unless the team can muster some small miracle over the next four days, though, the 1998–99 season will conclude in much the same fashion as it began — with many wondering what the Minutemen were truly capable of.

But that's not to say an A-10 Tournament title is completely out of the realm of possibility. Especially considering the fact that the Minutemen will be riding the laurels of emotional victory over conference powerhouse Temple last Sunday.

Four wins in four days. That's what UMass must do to capture the title and earn it's ninth consecutive trip to the national tournament. In fact, if the team fails to reach the A- 10 Championship game, it will not even qualify for the N.I.T. with a sub-.500 record. Given the significance of these next four days, Minuteman coach Bruiser Flint is taking the competition very seriously.

"The A-10 Tournament is about focus and courage. You don't have a lot of time to prepare," he said. "You're playing 24 hours later. If you focus on playing hard every night, off and you're winning."

After playing in the Final Four, senior point guard plays through injuries into final A–10 tournament

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Have you ever had a broken foot? Or tendinitis in your knee? Had rehabilitative surgery, lately? How about a stress fracture?

Try recovering from only one of them. Just try it. Then try to return to organized basketball, and while you're at it, try having the weight of the entire college hoop world on your shoulders, pressuring you to lead you're team.

Then try to be UMass senior captain Charlton Clarke. But you'll have to try hard, damn hard, because it's just about impossible to do what he has done.

It's also damn unfair, too. Damn unfair to utter a single unkind word about him. In a season that he could have abandoned long ago, the captain decided to stay with his ship. If It sinks, he'll go down with it. But make no mistake about it, Clarke will not go quietly, nor will he let his teammates.

Perhaps you've noticed him with a bit of a limp lately, or perhaps you haven't, since he usually plays through injuries anyway. This limp of his isn't from a sore ankle, or a sprained pinkie toe, or even a shin splint. It's from a stress fracture — a broken bone — in his foot, which prevents him from doing the many things a point guard needs to do.

It also prevents him from playing without pain. Just watch him wince when he steps on it the wrong way. Just watch him grimace as he tries to ignore the pain and drive to the basket for the good of his team. Just watch him.

"No pain. You have to go out there and say no pain," Clarke said. "It's going to hurt after the game. Let it hurt after the game because you're going to have a chance to rest it. Before that, you're playing until the horn goes off and you're winning."

And Clarke refuses to take a seat. Not in his final days as a member of the Maroon and White. The doctors had recommended that he rest. But Clarke said no. With little proven guard depth on the UMass roster, Clarke decided to suck it up, and finish the season on a broken foot. The ironic part is that, despite his pain, he doesn't want the season to end anytime soon. In fact, he wants his team to win the Atlantic 10 Tournament and qualify for the NCAA Big

Men's lacrosse crushes Crusaders

By Casey Kane

Three sophomores scored three goals apiece as the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team got its season underway with a 19–4 drubbing of Holy Cross yesterday at Richard F. Garber Field.

It was not only the trio of sophomores who provided the punch for the Minutemen, however, as UMass received point production from 13 different players. And nearly every team member saw game action.

"Anytime you get to play all your guys it great," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "These guys all practice hard. What's even better is that the older guys are happy for [the young players]."

It was the young players who got the offense going early yesterday. Less than three minutes into the contest, sophomore John Madigan came from around the Crusader cage high to the left of goalie Brian Duff and fired a shot high into the goal for a 1–0 lead.

A minute later Madigan struck again off an assist from freshman Marc Morley, with a bullet from the right side that went top shelf against Duff.

"It was good to get out, with a win right off the bat," Madigan said. "It felt good to get the offense going and to set the tone of the game."

Where Madigan left off, freshman Don Little picked up, putting the Minutemen ahead 3–0 after scooping up a loose ball in front of the net.

"We expected Marc to be a contributor, because he was a highly touted recruit last year," Cannella said. "Don is a bit of a surprise, but it's great to see him playing the way he is."

Jeremy Guski's performance was no surprise to the UMass coaching staff, who saw the midfielder rack up significant minutes in his first year. Guski started his sophomore campaign by hitting two consecutive scores — the first on an extra–man opportunity — within 1:01 of each other.

Little and sophomore midfielder Keith Gabrielli closed the first quarter scoring to push UMass to a six–goal advantage.

Freshmen lax prove up to challenge

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

It was a brisk afternoon at Garber Field, with the temperature around 41 degrees, and a mild wind blowing in at around 10–15 mph from the southwest, but throw on an overcoat, and factor in a 19–4 Massachusetts lacrosse victory over Holy Cross, and you have one marvelous opening day.

The Minutemen were sparkling during this commencement of the 1999 campaign, at least temporarily quieting the skeptics concerned with the youth on this year's lax squad.

"It was great to start the season off in this fashion," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said. "It is especially exciting for me being that we have such a large group of young players."

For some of those underclassmen, yesterday was not only the beginning of a season, but a collegiate career as well.

Four of the team's 10 freshmen got on the scoreboard with Don Little leading the way with two tallies.

Marc Morley, Dusty Smith, and Dan Paccione had one apiece in their respective debuts.

"I was glad to finally get out there in a game situation," Little said. "I was pretty comfortable, the older guys had given me a pretty good idea of what to expect."

"It was a great beginning," Morley said. "After the first run I got all the nerves out and settled down."

Having hammered Holy Cross last year 18–3 at Worcester, Cannella was curious to see how this team would stack up with the Crusaders.

Obviously his impressions of today's happenings were extremely positive, as the team showed no signs of having overlooked one of the weakest opponents they will face this season.

"The key thing for a team like this is to approach every game the same way," Cannella said. "We can't overlook anybody, so I was very pleased that the guys did not let up today."

Despite the runaway triumph, Cannella is aware that there are bigger battles to be won with the likes of Cornell, Virginia and Hofstra around the corner.

"In this game you have about two minutes to sit back and enjoy a victory," Cannella said. "After that we sit down and move right along to the next one."

One of the biggest question marks surrounding the team's personnel is in regards to the goaltending situation, and the opening day of action may have not have provided a definitive solution just yet.

Sophomore keeper Chris Campolettano got the call in net, making 11 saves, while allowing two goals.

Campolettano made way for Brian Soper as the third quarter began, and he responded with five saves, while allowing two scores as well.

Tom Gilligan guarded the pipes for the last seven minutes of play, recording one save, and allowing no goals.

Cannella has not fully committed to any of the trio's members, but he commended their play today, and conceded that Campolettano will likely start on Saturday at Cornell.

So while there are issues that need to be resolved, Cannella now knows he has a competent squad on his hands at least capable of some memorable opening day theatrics.

Young defense leads Massachusetts hockey

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Who would have thought that back in October, 32 games ago, the Massachusetts hockey team's strength would be its defense, which consisted of one senior, one junior, two sophomores and five freshmen. But it has been responsible for the Minutemen's recent clinching of a Hockey East playoff birth.

Of those nine defensemen only six have played a majority of the season. Brendan Shaw the lone senior has been injured all year playing in only four games. Kevin Tucker, a sophomore, has played in 13 games but has also been limited by some nagging injuries. Of those nine, UMass has learned to play with only six, four of which are freshmen.

"Most teams you see that have a lot of freshman back on defense, are prone to make mistakes. Teams that are rebuilding with a lot of freshman don't have much success. Our group of freshman have played really well and have had to play a lot of minutes and that's not only going to help us at the end of this season and in the playoffs but also next year," UMass coach Joe Mallen said.

"The trap" has been of great benefit to the Minutemen it has helped many of the young defensive players feel more at ease and have less opportunity to make a game breaking mistake. As of late the Minutemen have been playing the Trap more efficiently. The strategy has produced five wins in the last seven games.

"At the beginning of the year, we tried going toe-to-toe with teams and our offensive punch isn't as strong as some teams. We don't have a superstar, so we resorted to the trap and when we play the trap to a tee, and we don't break down, teams can't beat us," captain Dean Stork said.

"Our trap has gotten a lot better, you want to be able to be aggressive and fort check a lot but with a young team that's the direction we chose to go, and our kids have done a really good job executing, and we really get a lot offensive opportunities off the trap," Mallen said.

This stellar defensive unit consists of the team's captain, Stork. Sophomore Joey Culgin has played a limited leadership role, leading by example. And then there are the four freshman Randy Drohan, Toni Söderholm, Chris Brannen, and Justin Shaw.

"Defense in college hockey is a very tough position to learn, Dale Dunbar (UMass assistant coach) has done a great job working with our D and teaching them more about the position," Mallen said.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Dean Stork and Chris Brennan have been leading anchormen on a surprisingly young yet solid Minutemen men's hockey team that has earned a spot in the Hockey East Playoffs.

For Stork it's been a great season. The junior from British Columbia currently sits tied with injured forward Ray Geever for fifth place on the team in total points with 13. He is second on the team in goals, with nine. Of those nine goals Stork has five on the power play and two have been game winners.

"It all comes down to playing good defense. Off good defense you know your going to get your offensive chances and I've been just shooting the puck on net and they been going in for me. I didn't expect to score as much as I have, I'm more of a physical presence on the ice, but I been working hard defensively and on the power play and that's been helping me out a lot," Stork said of his performance.

In the two seasons prior, Stork combined for 14 points in 67 games, which makes this season all the more impressive.

"Dean has really done a great job in terms of his leadership and he has really stepped up his game. The number of goals he has scored and the way he plays defense back there has really helped out a lot," Mallen said.

Joey Culgin is only one of six players on the Minutemen to have played in all 32 games thus far this season. Culgin missed the first half of last season when he played with the Omaha Lancers in the USHL.

"Joey Culgin only played half a season last year, he is like a second semester freshman and he's played pretty steady back there. He had to really learn on the job how to play defensive college hockey," Mallen said.

Culgin has tallied three goals and five assists this season, one of the three goals was his game winner against the Merrimack Warriors earlier on this season.

"Joe's a workhorse. He works hard, day in and day out. He's a physical presence out on the ice and he does what he's told and he comes to the rink everyday focused, he's just a workhorse," Stork said of his teammate.

As for the freshmen defense:

Toni Söderholm has been the leading force offensively and defensively. He has tallied eight points thus far in his first season. Of those eight points seven are assists indicating that Söderholm really sees the ice well.

Protest on campus over affirmative action

Students, faculty protest changes

By Lenny Holston and Laura Forster
Collegian Staff

In the second protest of the semester, University of Massachusetts students came together with faculty, Five College members, and civil rights leader Anne Braden to make themselves heard yesterday afternoon.

Protesting against the recent university decision not to prioritize race in admissions policy, the protest organized by the Black Student Union took place in its traditional starting point — on the steps of the Student Union.

An enthusiastic crowd of about 500 students were in attendance at the protest.

One of the most prominent speakers was Ann Braden, a 74– year–old civil rights activist. Braden is from the Louisville, Ky. chapter of the Southern Organizing Committee for Education and Social Justice.

"People are overwhelmed and do not know what to do," Braden suggests that whites make themselves visible as an important first step. "The U.S. moves forward only when the young people move forward."

Braden also said "many whites don't want to think about race and want to sweep things under the rug." She attacked giving admissions on the basis of income saying it "will pit poor whites against blacks. [You] can't separate class and race, because they have been joined since the first slave ships arrived. When blacks get rights, so do poor whites." Braden cited Pell grants and other programs, which African– Americans initiated, as evidence.

Braden's predicts that if the University does not reverse its decision then "in a few years they [UMass administration] will be cutting out everyone but the elites."

John Bracey, professor of Afro–American studies, begged the administration for a moratorium on a decision he called "the most mean–spirited, backward thing they have ever done."

Bracey has been an active faculty member in reversing the University's decision and recently wrote a letter to Chancellor David K. Scott on the matter.

Bracey's proposal for the chancellor is to call on individuals specialized on the matters to come up with other solutions.

Bracey urged students to use pressure to make themselves heard if necessary: "We'll tell them there's a hurricane out of Amherst!"

Billye Smith, a sophomore Afro–American studies major at Amherst College and member of the college's Black Culture House and Black Women's Group, gave the oft–cited depiction of the Five College system as the characters from "Scooby Doo."

Smith immediately got the crowd's attention when she described UMass as Scooby, the dog of the Five College system because of the Chancellor's decision.

Applause erupted when she demanded that the other

Campus reacts with support and concern

The unity of 500 students chanting "No justice. No peace," while marching across campus yesterday afternoon, was not found among those standing outside the protest, as views on the issue of affirmative action and the protest varied.

"I don't think there should be affirmative action. I think in its own way it's racist. The University wants to upgrade this school and make it more prestigious, but by accepting people based on race or anything else, instead of academics, they're trying to go against the goal of upgrading the school," said Angela Anderson, a freshman biology major.

Another student felt race should accompany other admissions criteria.

"It shouldn't be solely based on race. In my opinion it should be based on academics or sports, not what color you are," said Kyle Shaw, a sophomore computer science major.

Other students, while not taking part in the protest, shared the views of the demonstrators.

"The bottom line is it's not a matter of ending affirmative action it's a matter of expanding affirmative action," said Tony Smith, a student admissions representative who said the University recruits Asian Latino African Native American [ALANA] students in the state, has an ALANA career fair in April and brings ALANA high school students to UMass.

"It's trying to cut our affirmative action. I don't think its right. It affects my people and my friends. They should do more for us I think," said Tehran Hunter, a junior sociology major.

"You should look at race in admissions. The campus is not as diverse as the state of Massachusetts," said Theo Green, a junior communications major.

But other students didn't come down fully on either side.

"I think it's good to have a diverse community for school for a job I wouldn't want to be discriminated against though," said Erin Carrarini, a junior communication disorders major.

But the protesters too talked the talk about the issue, but backed their message by walking the walk, right into the Whitmore Administration and Admissions Buildings, that is.

"[To make the administration listen, protestors will] step on their toes and step right through the door," said

Interview: Vanessa Rivera

[Editors Note: Vanessa Rivera was recently appointed the Interim Director of Admissions. She started work this week. The following interview was conducted approximately half an hour before the start of a student rally protesting changes in admissions procedures.]

Q: How long are you going to be serving as interim director?

A: Well, right now until a national search is conducted, and the new replacement comes in. I continue to be half– time at the College of Engineering, as the director of the Minority Engineering Program. So I'll be there, hopefully, until the end of this year, half–time here and half–time there — until the replacement comes in. During the summer, I'll be full–time most likely.

Q: Given your background in minority recruitment, what is your opinion towards the University's new changes in its affirmative action policies?

A: I knew that was coming (laughs). Well, what we're concerned about is all of the ALANA students that have applied and have been accepted to the University, and to ensure that we have the appropriate climate so that they decide to join us at UMass. We're interested in increasing the yields, and that's why I'm going to concentrate all of my efforts and my energy to make sure that all of these students that have already applied decide to come to the University. I'm confident that if we work hard enough to do that we'll accomplish it. All the issues aside, I'm confident that we'll be able to maintain diversity on campus.

Q: Do you think these changes will affect minority enrollment significantly?

A: I'm confident that with the numbers we have, if we concentrate on maintaining a positive climate at the University we'll be able to achieve the enrollments that we were hoping to achieve. But I think that it's a matter of everyone just uniting and being very positive. Politics and other issues — put those issues aside and concentrate on those students that we already know are interested in the University, so that they do come.

Q: Chancellor Scott has stated that ideally there would be a 20 percent minority population in for incoming freshman classes, even though less than 20 percent of Massachusetts public school graduates are minorities. Do you agree with this?

A: I'm not sure how that figure came about. I've heard that figure cited in several statements by Chancellor Scott to faculty and so on. I'm not sure how they came about that twenty percent figure, and I don't have the benefit of that history. This was a decision that was made prior to my tenure here, so I really don't know the history of that particular percent, but I'm positive that the enrollment of ALANA students will be maintained. We already have the applications. We have a good turnout on the applications and the accepted students, so that's all I can concentrate myself on now. This is my job, and that's what I was hired for — to make sure that we're able to continue to get ready for the Class of 1999, and that's why we need all of the students — thousands of students who are here on campus and who have had a great experience on campus to help us achieve those positive results and increase those yields.

Q: Finally, are there any changes that you would like to see made to the University's admissions policies?

A: I haven't had enough time here at this office to make a judgement on that yet. I think it would be a little

Affirmative action debate spills over into senate meeting

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Debate about the change in the admission policy started early at last night's Student Government Association meeting.

During announcements, Senator Paul Ferro from commuter area asked students to stop wasting his time and students' time. The rally today was an "amusing idea, but there was a court ruling and if you want to change it, go to court, put your money where your mouth is, otherwise no one will give a rat's ass. Hire a lawyer please, don't waste my time or students time running around campus taking over buildings."

Freshman ALANA student Malcolm Beckwith disagreed with Ferro about the University of Massachusetts decision to stop using affirmative action as part of the admissions process. "UMass had nothing to do with the decision at Boston Latin, UMass did not have to do that," said Beckwith.

SGA President Salwa Shamapande said he hopes that everyone supports what the ALANA students are doing. "This is a public institution and this really needs to be addressed, access is an issue." He then urged senators to learn about the issue and listen to their constituents.

After the meeting finally got under way, Seth Avakian, a senator from commuter area, made a motion to recognize a motion that wasn't on the agenda for last night's meeting.

Avakian said that's the SGA's responsibility to discuss the new admissions policy and that it should be placed it on the agenda. Avakian was prepared with a motion. It read "Whereas, the University's new admission policy will result in a severe reduction in the number of ALANA students on the Amherst campus, Be it enacted that the University turn to the Affirmative Action Policy for one year and Be it enacted that during this time the University find a way to attain a 20 percent ALANA enrollment without Affirmative Action."

Avakian successfully got the motion to be recognized and a debate ensued, ending with a graduate student cursing at the SGA and storming out. Ferro spoke first against passing this motion saying that UMass is a state university and the demographics of this state are whiter and that UMass is a reflection of this state. He also questioned "what students want."

"Do you want to judge people on their merits or the color of their skin? Twenty percent is a quota, we need active recruitment," Ferro did not want the SGA to take a stand on the issue saying that campus is divided on the issue and the motion was improperly written.

Speaking for the motion was Pahilya Napoli, a senator for the ALANA caucus. "ALANA student live in poor places, they mess up on SAT's, our circumstances aren't the same. It's messed up in the city. Students from Boston or the ghetto

Lewinsky talks in ABC interview about Clinton and relationship

(AP) — Excerpts from Barbara Walters' interview of Monica Lewinsky, which aired last night on ABC:

BARBARA WALTERS: One juror, at the grand jury, asked you why you kept having affairs with married men. Why did you? Why do you?

MONICA LEWINSKY: I have to say that was the most difficult question to answer in my entire experience with the grand jury. It was the most pointed question... I know I will never have an affair with a married man again... But, clearly to me, what I've come to see is that that happened because I didn't have enough feelings of self-worth. So that I didn't feel that... I was worthy of being number one to a man.

BW: You showed the president your thong underwear. Where did you get the nerve? I mean — who does that?

ML: ...If you take my word for it, it was a small, subtle, flirtatious gesture. And that's me.

BW: Was it saying "I'm available?"

ML: I think it was saying, "I'm interested, too. I'll play."

BW: Did you ever say to yourself, "I'm doing something wrong. This is bad for the president. This is bad for the country." Did you ever think about that?

ML: Now with everything that's happened... I feel bad that I didn't. But, I didn't at that time. I was enamored with him. And I was excited. And I was enjoying it.

ML: I think that one of the things that people have not been able to look at in this past year is that they looked at this and said "this is about a man and a woman, and not the president and an intern." He was very tender with me. He was very affectionate.

BW: Did your mother ever try to break off this relationship?

ML: Yes! Yes she did. But anyone who knows me knows that I'm stubborn, and from the time I was 2 years old, one of my first phrases was, with my hands on my hips, "You're not the boss of me!" And I've been that way ever since.

(Ms. Lewinsky is asked about her blue dress, which became a key piece of evidence in the investigation.)

BW: Ken Starr's people didn't know you had this dress. Why did you turn it over to them?

ML: Because I had to. Getting and keeping my immunity became very important to me. For I needed to take care of myself and my family. No one else was worried about me.

BW: Did you feel you had to then tell the whole truth about absolutely everything, including this dress?

ML: You bet. And I did... Every man I have met since this thing has happened eventually says to me, "So, what's the real story with the dress?" And it's humiliating. I wish I hadn't had it.

Court says Arizona can't use gas chamber

By Jerry Nachtigal
Associated Press

FLORENCE, Ariz. — Amid pleas of mercy from the German government, a federal appeals court yesterday ordered Arizona not to use the gas chamber to execute a German man whose brother was put to death last week.

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals refused to issue a stay for Walter LaGrand, 37, who was scheduled to die in a cloud of cyanide fumes yesterday afternoon for his role in the 1982 murder of a bank manager.

But the judges did say that the gas chamber is cruel and unusual punishment, and therefore unconstitutional.

The state appealed to the Supreme Court, but it was unclear when the execution would proceed. If the state is forced to ask for another death warrant from the Arizona Supreme Court, it would likely hold up the execution for weeks.

Last week, the 9th Circuit issued a stay in a nearly identical appeal by LaGrand's brother, Karl. But the Supreme Court overturned it in a matter of hours, and Karl was executed by injection for his part in the bank murder.

Walter LaGrand's case also was heard yesterday in the International Court of Justice in The Hague, Netherlands. Germany asked the world courts to intervene after Arizona Gov. Jane Hull rejected appeals from German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer to stop the execution.

The international court has no enforcement powers, but in a special, half-hour hearing, Judge Christopher Weeramantry of Sri Lanka urged the U.S. government to use "all the measures at its disposal" to prevent the execution.

The court also said the United States should pay unspecified damages for the death of Karl LaGrand, 35, who was the first German citizen executed in the United States since World War II.

Like his brother, Karl requested the gas chamber in hopes that the Supreme Court would agree that the method is unconstitutional. The high court disagreed and lifted the 9th Circuit's stay. Karl then accepted the state's last-minute offer of lethal injection. Walter rejected such an offer and said he would prefer a more painful execution in the gas chamber to protest the death penalty.

The last time Arizona executed an inmate in the gas chamber, in 1992, his death took 11 minutes and was considered so gruesome that the law was changed to require lethal injection. Killers sentenced to death before 1992, like the LaGrands, are given a choice. Germany does not have the death penalty and contends Arizona failed to advise the LaGrand brothers of their right to consular assistance at their trials.

Arizona officials conceded they violated the Vienna Convention but insisted the LaGrands were accorded all the rights any U.S. citizen would have received.

Of the 38 states with capital punishment, only Arizona, California, Maryland, Missouri and Wyoming offer the gas chamber as an optional method, according to Richard Dieter, executive director of the National Death Penalty Information Center. Only 10 of the more than 500 inmates executed since the death penalty was restored in 1976 have been put to death in the gas chamber, he said.

UMass student in critical condition after accident

University of Massachusetts student Allison Lustig was struck by a car yesterday evening and was rushed to the Bay State Medical Center in Springfield to be treated for head injuries.

According to UMass Police Chief John Luippold, at approximately 5 p.m. police responded to a report of a pedestrian car accident at the intersection of Commonwealth Avenue and Governors Drive.

Lustig, 19, of Shrewsbury, was treated on the scene by the Amherst Fire Department and transported to Bay State Medical Center, where she is listed in critical condition.

The Massachusetts State Police reconstruction team was called in to assist the UMass Police Department in an investigation of the incident.

The operator of the vehicle that struck Lustig was also a UMass student. She remained at the scene, and was interviewed by police to determine the cause of the accident.

No further information was available due to the preliminary nature of the ongoing investigation.

Dole heads for Kosovo to pitch peace proposal

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Increasing diplomatic efforts for a Kosovo peace deal, the administration is sending former Sen. Bob Dole to the province Thursday and considering dispatching veteran diplomat Richard Holbrooke to Belgrade for talks with Serb leaders, officials said yesterday.

State Department spokesman James Foley pointed to recent encouraging signs that the Kosovar Albanians have been moving toward acceptance of a peace plan proposed by six mediating nations.

After the Albanians formally agree, Foley said, "pressure on the Serbs to do so will mount."

"We believe that that message will become increasingly clear to President [Slobodan] Milosevic in the days to come," he added. On Capitol Hill, Defense Secretary William Cohen predicted that without a peace plan and peacekeepers, there was a "likelihood of bloodshed continuing to take place on a massive scale, with migrations of tens of thousands of people out of the region spilling into the other areas."

That, Cohen said, could "present us with a military mission in the future which would be far more expensive" than the 4,000-member U.S. contingent the administration envisions for Kosovo under a peace agreement.

Foley said Dole will go to Pristina, the provincial capital of Kosovo, to meet with a variety of Kosovar Albanian leaders. The hope is to win their endorsement of the decision of the Kosovar Albanian delegation to sign the accords during talks at Rambouillet, France, last month.

Dole's contacts will supplement those that chief U.S. mediator Christopher Hill has been having with Serb leaders in Belgrade. Dole, who leaves for the region today, is traveling at President Clinton's request.

In a statement late yesterday, Dole said the peace plan is not perfect but provides the best chance to put the people of Kosovo on a course of self-rule and liberty.

Of particular importance, Dole said, is the provision calling for implementation of the agreement by NATO troops with U.S. participation.

"With NATO troops for protection," he said, "the people of Kosovo can determine their own agenda and future."

are not prepared." She continued by saying UMass let her in "based on a whole bunch on things, and white women benefit from Affirmative Action too." Napoli also pointed out that she feared this would cause a snowball effect and we as a country would regress back to where we were 35 years ago.

Despite Napoli's effort the motion did not pass it was tabled and will be on SGA's agenda next week. When the motion did not pass, graduate student John Zibbell got up onto a chair and started cursing at members of the SGA. He said that he was interrupting "this little fucking meeting." He then said "you're all a bunch of white racist motherfuckers and you should go fuck yourselves." He then left he meeting and did not return.

Student senate Associate Speaker Jodi Bailey said "the encourages people to come to the meetings but there is an appropriateness to the way you do things. The swearing and the walking on chairs was inappropriate and he was rude." Shamapande said this all comes out of the "frustration and that no one is listening."

Scent of a dud

If you've ever been to an outlet store then you know that some of them are full of a lot of good stuff that you can't get anywhere else, and some of them are full of a ton of junk that nobody wants. Well, a couple of weeks ago I went up to some outlet stores in Maine with my mother. We went to J. Crew and got some nice clothes that I otherwise would have had to order and not had the luxury of trying on.

The next outlet store that I went into was called The Lobster Emporium. All that it sold was lobster-related items. They had mailboxes shaped as lobsters, beanie lobsters, lobster telephones and hundreds of other unnecessary lobster items. The only thing that was worth buying we bought three of — they were jumper cables shaped as lobster claws. After The Lobster Emporium my mother and I went into Perfume Palace. Here is where my story begins.

As soon as I walked in I lost my mother in the fog of perfume. I tried looking for her, but the air was too thick. I started becoming light-headed and dizzy. The perfume was engulfing me and filling my lungs. I began stumbling and then, from what I understand, I passed out and crashed through a display case of Tommy Girl perfume. The next thing I knew I woke up in the first-aid room. It was only about 25 minutes later. They told me what had happened, ran some tests, gave me a tank of pure oxygen and then sent me on my way.

When I walked out of the first-aid room I found myself in the very far corner of the largest perfume store in all of Maine. I was nervous that I may not have had enough oxygen in my tank to get all the way back to the entrance. I started walking and then one of the aisles in the back caught my eye. In big pink letters it said "FORGOTTEN IMITATIONS." I decided that I would go check out that aisle in hopes of finding a cheap present for my mom or grandmother. I couldn't believe what I found in that aisle.

The first thing that caught my eye was Ralph Lauren's Off The Wagon. This was a perfume for single women in their late thirties or forties. It was particularly meant for women who had exhausted every avenue of finding a husband.

If the women had become so desperate that the only man they could get was the town drunk then they should wear Off The Wagon. By wearing this scent the woman will give off an aroma that says that she has been drinking for a month straight without a shower. This way when she approaches the town drunk on his bench, or wherever he may lie, he will not think that she is there to antagonize or pity him. He will think that the woman approaching him is also a town drunk. Then they can live happily ever after by either drinking their lives away or just smelling like it with Off The Wagon.

A few steps down the aisle another bottle caught my eye. This one was a cologne for men called Assassination. It was in the shape of a pistol. In the bottle the cologne looked red, but it sprayed on clear just like any other perfume or cologne. The slogan said, "Assassination will bring out the killer instinct you need to get by." It is recommended for all businessmen and assassins.

There were also quotes from a couple of past wearers. Lee Harvey Oswald was quoted as saying, "Assassination brought out the best in me and my shooting abilities." John Wilkes Boothe, one of the first ever loyal Assassination wearers said, "Assassination was murder on my wallet, but it's a killer scent." As you may notice, the reason that this cologne never caught on was that it indirectly caused the deaths of two of the greatest men in American History.

The next cologne I saw was called Tar. It was really just a bottle full of tar. It's slogan was " sTARt at the top!" The reason this was never caught on is fairly obvious I would say.

The last one that I really examined was Calvin Klein's Masturbation. It came in a bottle that was shaped like a hand. I couldn't help reading the description on the box. Somehow the people in charge of scents at CK came up with a perfume that could only be smelled by the wearer. It was a bunch of different herbs and chemicals that when mixed with your natural odor produced a most heavenly aroma — to you.

At the same time, no matter how much you put on, nobody else will be able to smell you. You can be confident without worrying that you smell too strong. Masturbation turned out to be kind of a dud though. Most of the people who wore it thought that they smelled so good that they ended up staying in most nights and just partying with themselves.

I did try all four of these scents. When I wore Masturbation I became something of a hermit for a couple of weeks. When I tried Off The Wagon I kept coming home with 50-year-old drunks that I met uptown. Thank God most of them were women. When I wore Tar I had to have it surgically removed. Also, as a result of wearing Assassination I am now being charged with assault. I can't recommend any of these. So if you get one of them as a gift, as most of my family and friends will sometime this year, please don't take the chance. You may never live to wear another scent again.

Follow your heart

A friend of mine came into my dorm a couple of nights ago and announced quite happily that she had decided to change her major. She had decided that she really didn't like the classes she was in and that, despite the fact that the money in the field would have been amazingly high (no jokes about how to me, an English major, any amount of money is high), her happiness was more important to her.

Why should I tell you this story? Other than the fact that she is going to be embarrassed by my column, my friend hit the nail on the head with her decision to look into other majors.

Nothing in life matters, unless you are happy.

That's why you have read more than a few articles about what English majors are going to do with the rest of their lives, and how compared to some of the more employment-oriented majors, English is not a place to make boat-loads of cars filled with money. The fact of the matter is, most of the English majors like examining the duality of Chaucer, the repeating structure of Poe's "The Raven," or the communist theories presented by Thomas More.

Anyway, we do it 'cause we like it. That is the best way to live life, right? Why kill yourself for money when for a few sacrifices you could be fulfilled by your work? I'm not naive enough to think that money isn't a necessary aspect of life, but maybe I am naive enough to suggest that we as a society should allow our members to live the lives they want to live.

Chris Collins

So back to my friend. She thinks she wants to teach little kids. I think it is a great idea, she'd make a helluva teacher. She still is a little worried about getting money. I think she should do what she wants. Follow your heart and all the rest of that stuff that comes in the fortune cookies or the Collegian horoscopes.

Along the same lines, I have friends who are involved in campus activities. They are frustrated and tired by the way the groups work or the politics and the back stabbing which exist in the group. In general, my friends who are in these groups do what they do because they love the work. It pains me to see them stop loving something because of the atmosphere.

Of course, there really isn't anything I can do about changing this, other than to give my friends sympathy and tell them to do what they think is best for them. In other words, I've ended up saying, "Follow your heart," to way too many people in recent days, so I figured I might as well say it to all three of the people who read my column.

Follow your heart. Take the risk. Stop asking, "What if?" for a minute and do what you know you can. Start small if you need to, but work your way up. Join the club. Ask out the cute member of the opposite sex. Decide to take an art course, or that language that you've always wanted to try, or whatever it is for you. This especially applies to all the people on campus who, after they hear that I write for the paper say, "Oh I always wanted to try that." If there is anything that you have ever wanted to try, now is the time, here is the place. If I wanted to be overly clichéd I would say just do it. Trying something is scary, but it is the only way that you will ever know what you are capable of.

I'm not going to guarantee that it will work out the first time, or any other time for that matter. Become pro-active because even if you do end up a vagrant on the street, you will be able to say that you were true to your soul and yourself.

Finally, if you do take my advice and are going to try something remember the following three things: Number 1: Good luck. Letter B: Always pack a clean pair of underwear. Roman numeral III: Don't get discouraged, everyone has a hard time doing anything for the first time.

And justice for all

As I'm sure you know, there has been a lot of discussion about affirmative action these days and UMass' attempt at reforming it. Affirmative action is a vain attempt by Americans to incorporate more students from underrepresented minority groups (according to race only) into the college system. Well, I must say that this is the dumbest, most cowardly, counterproductive idea that I have ever heard!

Excuse me for being blunt, but what the hell is being accomplished here? Hmm, let me think... nothing! This whole idea is racist in nature and needs to be entirely rethought. I have read many articles stating that minority groups only make up a small portion of the student body at UMass. Well, what do you think the word "minority" means? It means that there aren't as many people in these groups than in the "majority." If this is at all earth- shattering, then I'll walk you down to Whitmore myself, so you can withdraw from the University for being a moron.

Gary Mendese

The word "minority" has always had such a negative meaning in this country, but all that it represents is a number, a figure. And many members of "minority" groups have been claiming that doing away with affirmative action will go against all of the hardship their ancestors went through to get them this far.

This is about as ludicrous as Clinton saying he "did not have sexual relations with that woman." In other words, it's B.S. It's B.S. because it's irrelevant. Indeed, their ancestors have had to go through a lot of painful and evil ordeals in order to gain respect in this world, but that has nothing to do with the college admissions process.

If you think that you're going to be denied something because affirmative action is eliminated, then you didn't deserve it in the first place. The point is, if you need affirmative action to get into college, then you don't deserve to be here. Plain and simple. I don't come from a rich family, but I worked my butt off in high school, am attending UMass, and will hopefully will be going on to medical school. Does the fact that I'm Italian have anything to do with that? Should it? Absolutely not! Now I know that some of you are steaming right now, and if you are then go for a walk or something. Throwing a temper tantrum or protesting in front of the Student Union won't accomplish a damn thing.

The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) held a rally outside the Student Union last week, and when I walked by it, I couldn't help but laugh. I mean, does anyone really take a bunch of scanron-feeding, narcissistic, self-indulgent, screaming lunatics seriously? I can't believe that a union of students even exists here at UMass, because most schools focus more on... what's it called again? Oh yeah, learning. Will someone please tell these intemperate fools to find a real cause and stick to it? Their recent rally dealt with affirmative action, and of course confused the entire issue.

Chancellor Scott's new affirmative action program will not stop ALANA or other minority students from coming to the University. Their grades will! And I know that the purpose of affirmative action is to get more disadvantaged high school kids into college. Some minority groups (which does not include every group in ALANA) live in impoverished neighborhoods where they are neglected by Uncle Sam, and therefore don't have decent grade school and high school educations. Because of this, they don't do as well on the SATs. Their low-tier high schools' names do not get Harvard to come knocking at their doors.

I am not blind to this, and to be honest, it disgusts me. It makes me sick to know that while some dweeb in ugly clothes won a $1 million purse in a golf game the other day, millions of Americans (of all "colors") are uneducated, starving, and dying everyday! You don't see GEO standing up for these people, do you?

Some people don't have a proper education, but that is no reason to put them in college to give them "a chance." If someone can't speak with decent grammar, do well on the SATs, and earn the required GPA needed for entrance into a college, then he or she shouldn't be allowed in! If you want to improve the quality of education and make it equal for all Americans, perhaps some more money should go to the schools in the poor neighborhoods. That would be a great idea, wouldn't it? But just letting people come into the school because they were disadvantaged earlier in life is counterproductive, as horrible as that might sound.

I don't want to sound like a totalitarian, but it's not fair to the minority student taking advantage of affirmative action, the minority student that didn't need it to get in, and the population at large, which some ignoramuses like to call "White America" or "the man."

And if you think I'm wrong, check the UMass statistics to see the percentages of those minority students who either drop out or are academically withdrawn from UMass compared to the "typical" applicant. I think those stats would end this debate in its tracks. Apparently some "numerically unqualified" students that were given the chance just because of race couldn't make the grade, and that's sad. It's sad because it's probably due to the fact that they couldn't handle college given an insufficient background in early education.

So, the buck stops here, folks. Affirmative action pertaining to race or socio-economic background won't improve anyone's chances at college. Those who can make it make it, and those that aren't well-prepared don't. It's sad, and we need to fix that. We need to improve early education throughout the country to give equal opportunities "and justice for all."

Image is not everything

I know that I am not alone when I question if Monica, Rachel, and Ally are thinner this season than last. In an age where we put emaciated women in the media spotlight, and female models weigh 23 percent less than the average American woman, it is not really a question of are they, but how damaging it is to us all, that we admire them for it.

Last week was National Eating Disorder Awareness Week, and unfortunately, there is a commonly held misconception that this issue has long been dealt with. Sadly, the statistics are rising.

Aimee Langevin

We can't ignore the effects that obsession with unrealistic images of beauty and thinness have on the physical and emotional well-being of women.

Despite the fact that eating disorders have the highest mortality rate out of all psychiatric illnesses, they have remained a your problem issue. My goal is to make others realize that those suffering from eating disorders, as well as those most vulnerable to developing them, should not have to deal with them alone.

Last year, nearly $40 billion was sucked out of our pockets and fed into the hands of the diet, cosmetic, and beauty industries. These industries make their money by keeping us in a state of constant self-reflection of our bodies.

We have become so obsessed with our outward selves, that success in other areas of our lives simmers on the back burner, while we try to boil away our "imperfections."

In a recent survey of women, nearly 50 percent reported that they would rather lose 10–15 pounds than have guaranteed success in careers or relationships.

Take a moment to reflect upon your own life and what you would like to change the most. Was one of your top three wishes fixing a physical flaw?

Why am I so passionate about raising awareness around this problem? Despite the fact I recovered from an eating disorder which took over my life and suffocated my self-esteem, and despite the fact that as a Women's Studies and Psychology major I feel educated and aware concerning women's issues; unfortunately, despite all of those things, I still live amongst these powerful images with all of you.

It takes a lot of energy and self-worth to keep your chin up and enjoy all life has to offer. When air-brushed images of computer-generated women weigh down your mind, you cannot help picking apart your own physical frame.

As someone who has spent several years obsessed with counting calories and compulsively exercising, finally freeing your mind from the grip of damaging social images, and actively fighting against social pressures to look like Kate Moss, is a guaranteed self-esteem booster.

Eating disorders are a serious concern especially for college women. I developed bulimia and anorexia athletica as a sophomore in high school. It wasn't until I was a freshman at Stanford University, on an athletic scholarship, that the disorder began to seriously take it's toll on my physical and mental health.

The fact that I could force myself to run over 100 miles a week, but I couldn't stop one bite of food from turning into a binge, should be an indication of the extreme level of control this type of disorder can have over someone's life.

Eating Disorders progress along a continuum. What seems like an innocent and harmless diet can lead to an even poorer body image, damaged self-esteem, severe malnutrition, and compulsive exercising. Not to mention the state of depression and fear that develops because the individual feels completely out of control, caught in a vicious cycle. This is why it is so important to get help before the extreme end of the continuum is reached, where hospitalization and/or death are the only steps remaining.

Through counseling and self-therapy (books, journal writing, art work etc.), true happiness and health have surfaced in my life. People can and do recover from eating disorders.

An absorbing, moving Things Fall Apart

Chinua Achebe, author of Things Fall Apart, reads his fiction and poetry at Bowker today at 4 p.m.

THINGS FALL APART
Bowker Auditorium
March 2

As the lights come up on the stage, the mournful yet beautiful song of the Nigerian Igbo clan begins quietly and crescendos as the stage lights pierce the darkness. All of the characters remain still, staring off into the distance, while the harmonious voices of the cast of Things Fall Apart moved audiences in Bowker Auditorium Tuesday night.

The music continues as a white man enters followed by some recruited native officers, and they demand to know where is the man called Okonkwo. The clan remains silent. The white District Commissioner threatens to imprison the entire clan if they don't produce Okonkwo.

Reluctantly, one man answers. He tells the Commissioner that Okonkwo was a great man, who was forced to destroy himself because of the infiltration of white people on the Igbo culture. It becomes apparent that the man with his arms swinging, standing with his back to the audience is the focus of the clan's sorrowful song.

From this scene, the chronology of the play moves into the past, beginning with the childhood of this man called Okonkwo. Born the son of a weak man, Okonkwo desires a decidedly different fate. He becomes a champion wrestler, a fierce warrior, and a respected member of the Igbo clan.

The play then continues to move through the different stages of Okonkwo's life. The other characters in the play take turns acting as the narrator, which is highly effective. This shared third-person narration provides us with an inside look at the thoughts of the characters and at times it gives us a play-by-play account of the unfolding action.

Although because most of the actors portray at least three different characters, at some points the characterization becomes a little bit confusing. But for the most part, the character portrayals were powerfully moving.

When the Igbo's revered oracle pronounces that his adopted son, who was won in a fight with a neighboring tribe, must be killed, Okonkwo does not question the oracle's authority. But, against the advice of a clan elder, Okonkwo participates in his the slaying of his adopted son. This moment seems to mark a significant change in Okonkwo; he is radically altered by it.

When Okonkwo accidently kills another member of his clan, he is exiled for seven years. While in exile, he encounters a white man (a Christian missionary) for the first time. One of the storyteller's describes the effects of the British missionaries on the clan: "The white man is very clever... Now he has won our brothers and our clan can no longer act like one. He has put a knife on the things that held us together and we have fallen apart."

While the setting and the props used by the characters are minimal, those that are used are used in a very creative manner. While at the beginning the backdrop appears to be an arbitrary wall hanging, the designs painted on it are skillfully incorporated into the action of the play. Each design is illuminated to indicate that it is being utilized or seen by the characters. Red clay covered the floor of the stage and as the characters moved and danced around a fine dust moves around the auditorium, transporting the audience back to Nigeria in the late 1800s.

The ritualistic music, drawn from the Nigerian traditional domain with original devices and lyrics by Chukwama Okoye, provided a spectacular rhythmic backdrop for the play. It allows the storyline to flow effortlessly from one scene into the next. The music which accompanied the dancing was entertaining in and of itself. Because it was so uplifting and engaging, it made the barrier between the stage and the audience disappear. Kathleen Toohey, a UMass student, said that she felt like getting up to dance with the actors.

As the play draws to a close, large lighted cracks on the backdrop indicate that the Igbo clan is quickly unravelling. The narrative has now come full circle. The same melancholy lament which opens the play, closes the play. It is indicative of the fact that things have fallen apart. This play is a fascinating history of one clan's rich cultural heritage, and its destruction by an aggressive outside presence, the British colonialists.

The final scene is especially heartwrenching as the real son of the dead Okonkwo appears dressed in British clothes and announces that his name is now Isaac. Leaving the theater, the audience is left to ponder this fact of the brutal success of colonialism, and the destruction that it has left in its wake.

Nostalgia fever emerges

Four UMass students entertain the valley

The UMass singing group Nostalgia.

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

As they finished their last verse, the crowd applauded with joy. Nostalgia had just given the Cape Cod Lounge occupants a mini–concert. This is the life of Nostalgia.

Four male students of the University of Massachusetts have come together to form one of the hottest a cappella groups in the Pioneer Valley.

Rodney "Fizu" Larty–Otoo, a senior communication major, Remos Jourdan, a junior education and sociology major, George Papino Wood, a sophomore school of management major, and Andy Dejean, a freshman legal studies major, are "Nostalgia." The four men are managed by Paul Williams, a freshman computer science major.

Nostalgia is a product and a part of Boundaries — a Registered Student Organization devoted to providing an outlet of expression for students on campus.

Allana Todman (founder and president of Boundaries) had a vision of a male singing group," Jourdan said.

During a Boundaries meeting in late November of 1998, the men discovered each other's talents and proceeded in making it happen.

"We didn't know Rey could sing because he was always doing poetry, and Fazu came around after a couple of weeks," said Dejean.

"Once we found out that one another could sing, it all fell together."

When they met they were merely strangers, but the music has brought the four men together into a family.

"We didn't even know each other. Now were not only about music, we care about each other," said Larty–Otoo.

"We have harmony within harmony," said Dejean.

Each of the four members of Nostalgia brings a different style, a different contribution to the table. Larty–Otoo delivers more of the bass to the group. Dejean provides the freshness and crisp to the group, while Jourdan contributes with his versatility. Wood brings the pipe — he reaches notes that are unaccessible to many.

Nostalgia models themselves after R&B groups such as Shai, Boyz to Men, Dru Hill, Az Yet and the Temptations.

The group has come a long way since its inception in late November of last year.

"In November we didn't know what we were capable of doing, but now we know that we can do even better," said Wood.

"We trust each other now. If one of us makes a mistake, we can pick it up and it goes unnoticed," said Dejean.

Nostalgia made their debut on Dec. 5, 1998 at Soultry Rhythms, a Boundaries–sponsored event at the Student Union Ballroom.

"They may not have noticed but when they came on, a lot of people moved to the front," said Williams.

"At one point I looked out and I saw people fanning themselves, I was shocked," said Wood.

Nostalgia has also performed at several events and locations. These include their first paid performance at Amherst College, the Black Student Union sponsored "All That Jazz," the John Quincy Adams dorm's Mardigras, Vietnamese Night, at local dining commons, the Campus Center Concourse, birthday parties and many private shows.

Upcoming performances include Southwest Week, the Iota Phi Theta Talent Show, Northeastern University and at the Campus Center Concourse.

Nostalgia currently has plans on recording a demo tape.

"We're going to start working on the demo over Spring Break," said Jourdan.

As far as a music career is concerned, Nostalgia is keeping their dreams within reach.

"We're students first, but if we get a chance we'll take it," said Dejean.

"We have to really thank the founder of Boundaries, Allana Todman, and also Chiquinha Robinson, Ruth Charlemagne, Cassandra Carty and Boundaries as a whole," said Nostalgia.

It's time to Experience Hendrix

After nearly 30 years, the record is finally being set straight. Jimi Hendrix is now being recognized as one of the most talented musicians, in any context, to have lived in this century.

This is mostly due to the large reissuing project undertaken by Hendrix's family and their company Experience Hendrix L.L.C. Over the past two years Experience Hendrix has rereleased all four albums made by Hendrix during his lifetime, as well as more than doubling his catalog with a number of beautifully done projects aimed at completing the picture of the artistic output of the guitarist.

Experience Hendrix has done a admirable job in carrying forward Hendrix's vision as well as maintaining his artistic integrity, and it is apparent in these recent releases that one of the goals of the company is to make up for the mishandling of his material by record companies in the 1970s and 1980s. Experience Hendrix has accomplished this by riding the momentum of Jimi's final musical projects, which were left incomplete at the time of his death.

It is no doubt that Hendrix was making incredible strides into the future at the time of his death in 1970, and such recent projects as First Rays of the New Rising Sun and South Saturn Delta perfectly illustrate that. However, an even more vital piece of the puzzle is represented in his live performances at that time.

The most recent Hendrix release is a multi-media project dealing with the music of the Band of Gypsys. Jimi Hendrix: Live at the Fillmore East is the definitive collection of music performed by the Band of Gypsys on two nights, Dec. 31, 1969, and Jan. 1, 1970 at the Fillmore East in New York City, which are the only recorded performances of this short-lived ensemble.

Accompanying the CD is a documentary video "Jimi Hendrix: Band of Gypsys" which features Interviews, as well as footage of a number of songs which do not appear on the CD. This documentary chronicles a large portion of the music made by this band, as well as sets the music in a historical context, dealing with the times, the music scene, and Hendrix's own life and creative process at that point in 1969 and early 1970.

The most historically interesting aspect of the video is the view of Hendrix's music held by Miles Davis, given by a mutual friend of both musicians, Taharquz Aleem. This gives only a small insight to the deep connection felt between Davis and Hendrix, and the only substantial amount of information on their relationship is found in Mile's autobiography. The musical content of these projects is the most standout feature, and the opportunity to listen to some staple Jimi Hendrix Experience pieces such as "Stone Free," as well as some Band of Gypsys originals like "Earth Blues" and "Power of Soul" is the only way to illustrate the progress Hendrix was making as a musician and as a performer.

It is hard to find a live performance from any point in his career in which his playing holds up to the fire and straight-forwardness heard here. In listening to the CD It is clear that Hendrix was out to make a statement, and as it turns out one of the statements he did make was that his music has the power to transcend generations in such a way that it is only now being understood just how on target he was artistically and socially.

Both the video and the CD are essential to understanding and fully appreciating the art of Jimi Hendrix.

Dusty Springfield dead at 59

By Kristin Gazlay
Associated Press

LONDON — Singer Dusty Springfield, whose husky-voiced white soul could simultaneously "chill the spine and warm the heart," has died after a long battle with breast cancer. She was 59.

Springfield, who recorded such 1960s hits as "Son of a Preacher Man" and "Wishin' and Hopin'," died Tuesday night at her home in Henley-on-Thames, west of London.

Mike Gill, who worked with the singer for nearly 32 years and is compiling a four-CD tribute for release later this year, called hers "an intimate voice with wonderful pathos."

The box set was put together "with Dusty's full knowledge and her blessing when she knew she was dying. She said, 'Tell Mike to get things organized. I want to go out with a bit of style,'" he said.

Singer Elton John, on tour in the United States, called Springfield "as good a singer as Aretha Franklin in her own way, and completely timeless."

The Encyclopedia of Popular Music paid tribute to her inviting voice, saying she could "chill the spine and warm the heart." Springfield's finest album is considered 1969's Dusty in Memphis, which she made in Tennessee.

Though she started out in several groups, her first solo success came in 1964 with the jaunty "I Only Want To Be With You." Other hits included "I Just Don't Know What To Do With Myself" and "You Don't Have to Say You Love Me."

In 1988, she returned to the charts by teaming up with the Pet Shop Boys duo for the pop single "What Have I Done to Deserve This?"

Her resurgence was capped this decade with the inclusion of "The Son of a Preacher Man" on the Pulp Fiction soundtrack, which introduced her to a whole new audience.

Springfield's breast cancer was diagnosed in 1994 shortly after she recorded her most recent album, "A Very Fine Love."

She underwent extensive chemotherapy until 1995, when she was diagnosed as being clear of the disease. But the cancer returned the following year.

After the first diagnosis, she told The Mail on Sunday in January, "I shed about three tears in the hallway and then said, 'Let's have lunch.'"

"It was only when I came home one night and saw my cat lying asleep that I thought, 'Who's going to look after you?' It was as if somebody had run a train through me. I wept and wept and wept because then I realized: It is you. It's you. Yes, it might kill you."

Dusty Springfield was born Mary Isabel Catherine Bernadette O'Brien in north London on April 16, 1939. She changed her name in 1960, using the name of the folk-country trio The Springfields, which she and her brother formed before she launched her solo career.

She became known for her glitzy gowns, peroxide-blonde beehive hairdo and dark, smudgy eye make-up, an effect achieved by leaving on the same caked-on mascara for three weeks at a time. But she once said she never shook off the feeling of being an "awful fat, ugly middle-class kid."

She told The Mail on Sunday that her personal and musical epiphany came at the age of 16 when she looked at her reflection in the mirror and said: "Be miserable or become someone else." And she did.

Springfield's biographer, Lucy O'Brien, whose book "Dusty" will be published in April, wrote: "As youth mod culture came to a head in the Sixties — with its stringent attention to fashion, Motown and television pop programs - Dusty Springfield, panda-eyed and urbane, emerged as Queen Bee."

Professing herself "bored with Britain," Springfield moved to Los Angeles in 1972, where she lived for 15 years, embarking on drinking and drug binges and suffering from depression. She later disclosed she had attempted suicide in California.

Springfield's death came 11 days before she was to be inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame at a ceremony in New York, along with Paul McCartney and Bruce Springsteen.

In December, Queen Elizabeth II included her in her biannual honor's list, as an Officer of the Order of British Empire. Buckingham Palace issued a statement saying the queen was "saddened to hear of her death."

Springfield never married, and information on survivors was not immediately available. Funeral plans were not released.

Synthetic actors threaten to take over the silver screen

By Jordan Lite
Associated Press

SAN RAFAEL, Calif. — It will hardly knock movie stars off the silver screen, but animators are creating computer-generated humans who are becoming actors in their own right.

These so-called "synthespians" are increasingly popping up in films, threatening to displace already meagerly paid extras as the technology becomes less expensive than salaries for real live people.

The dinosaurs that looked all too real in "Jurassic Park have given way to a 40-foot gorilla with personality in "Mighty Joe Young." And he's setting the stage for a realistic looking Frankenstein monster in the first totally digital, photo-realistic feature film ever, expected to be released by Universal Pictures sometime late next year.

Everything about it, from the environment to the characters, will have a surreal quality that can't be filmed using traditional animation or real people.

"The question is, will these people who have become (computer-generated) featured extras become stars?" asks Larry Kasanoff, a producer who also heads Threshold Digital Research Labs, a special effects company in Los Angeles.

"Yes," he says. "We're in the movie business. There are no weird moral dilemmas."

Kasanoff's "Beowulf," due later this year, features a realistic looking digital seductress interacting with a live actor in a supporting role.

So far, the most famous animated "stars" have come from San Rafael-based Industrial Light & Magic, where a "Star Wars" storm trooper and Darth Vader watch over the reception desk. Today, animators are hard at work on the eagerly awaited "Star Wars: Episode I - The Phantom Menace."

But ILM designers are working on improving digital humans, too. The evolving technology has become so popular that at ILM, 450 artists create computer-generated characters, compared to just four artists 10 years ago.

"We have fake actors, generally called synthesplans," says Carl Frederick, ILM's associate visual effects supervisor. These synthespians, often used in stunts or crowd scenes, aren't meant to be computer-generated stars. But eventually someone is bound to create a synthespian who will become a digital screen idol.

It even has the Screen Actors Guild worried. Despite assurances that no digital human could replace a Robin Williams, Will Smith or Gwyneth Paltrow, SAG spokesman Rafe Greenlee says computer-generated actors are "definitely something we're very interested and concerned about."

But for now, Perkins says, it still costs too much to create a digital star.

"You can hire one person to act or you could hire a crew of 20 to 50 to create this one performance. It's always going to be cheaper to hire one person to do it right then and there," he says.

For big crowd scenes, though, computer technology can be cost-efficient, Kasanoff says. While it might cost $150,000 to computer-generate 1 million people in one place, the tab for that many extras working for just a day would be about $500,000. "It starts to save a lot of money. (People) get hungry, they get cold, it starts to rain," says Kasanoff, who produced the "Mortal Kombat" movies.

Aww, how cute

later.

Unlike beers, wines can change for a person depending on their mood, what they've been eating, the year, or a number of other factors. Taking notes isn't a necessity but they can help get a grasp on a sometimes overwhelming realm wine can occupy.

• Pace yourself

In order not to give a bad rap to all new college wine drinkers by walking out of a wine-tasting smashed, make sure to give yourself time between tastings. The portions are very small and usually light snacks are served with the wine to help bring out the wine's flavors and keep patrons from getting too drunk.

This is why more serious, experienced wine drinkers may be found spitting their wines into buckets provided by the table, since really the taste of the wine is supposed to be found from the initial effect of wine held in the mouth.

Spitting has not, however, been a common practice at the more laid back wine-tastings which I have been to. I think that if enough attention is paid to pacing and you don't go on an empty stomach, you should be fine. But if you're not used to drinking wine, or any alcohol for that matter, spitting may be a good idea and is perfectly safe where manners are concerned.

Wine is an art to be at least tried by everyone at some point in their life. It is not about getting trashed as "the other alcoholic beverage," it is a very personal and enjoyable hobby which is also good for your heart. Because there's so much involved with understanding wine, it's a good idea to begin going to wine-tastings now. With time you can decide for yourself whether you prefer to drink with a pinky extended or not.

Clerks the TV show; "Creek" out-

This past week, there was a report that one of the funniest movies of the 1990s may be turned into a prime-time series.

There has been a lot of talk about how to expand on Kevin Smith's widely popular debut film Clerks. Smith's first movie was not only his most successful work, but also the best in his trilogy of comedies that include Clerks, Mallrats and Chasing Amy.

Though Smith has been rumored to be working on a new film entitled Dogma with stars such as Matt Damon, Ben Affleck, Chris Rock, and a cameo by Alanis Morrissette in which she plays God, he has pretty much vanished off of the entertainment scene since releasing Chasing Amy in 1997. Was is not common knowledge is that Smith was also a co-producer of Gus Van Sant's widely acclaimed Good Will Hunting.

Last week, it was announced that Smith is working on making Clerks into a six episode mini-series that would air sometime next year. There was no word on whether the actors in the film would reprise their roles, or whether or not the show would even be based on the same characters. It seems like anything less than the excellence of the film would be a strong disappointment.

When Clerks was released in 1993, it received huge acclaim, and when it was released on video, it was immediately turned into a cult-classic. Clerks is the story of Dante, a convenience store clerk, and Randall, a clerk at a video store, and their hilariously sarcastic take on life.

Though it is rumored that there are copies that can be found with an alternate ending that involves Dante's death, the version that most people have seen simply ends with Dante in a state of confusion while being torn between his love of two women. Early reports say that the mini-series will pick up where the movie ended.

As a huge fan of Clerks, I simply hope that it is not completely ruined by a change in scenery. It will be difficult to see how such a lewd and adult-oriented film will work well on censored television, but hopefully, Smith will be the genius that he is, and find a way for the series to live up to the quality of the movie.

Movies made into television shows have had decidedly mixed results. Series such as "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" have been extremely successful, but series such as "Clueless" have not. The irony is that when they were films, Clueless was considered a hit, but Buffy the Vampire Slayer was simply awful. If this is the only indication we have, then I guess we shouldn't expect too much of the Clerks television series.

In other news, some series are starting to look towards more diversified plot lines to try to draw viewers in. In a recent episode of "Dawson's Creek," Jack, the character who plays Katie Holmes' boyfriend, has come out of the closet, and will change the way the entire cast is seen. On an episode of "Spin City," the mayor of New York, played by Brian Bostwick, has revealed that he is having a romantic relationship with his African-American secretary.

But the most recent news to be released is coming out of the FOX studios. In an episode of "Party Of Five" during May sweeps, Julia (Neve Campbell) will enter into a relationship with another woman.

It seems ironic that all of these situations are coming about only weeks after Reverend Jerry Falwell reamed the makers of the British children's television show, "The Teletubbies," because he thinks that Tinkie-Winkie, a male, purple teletubby who carries a purse, is homosexual. Falwell also made the announcement that he felt that the anti-Christ was walking among us, and will reveal himself a Jewish male.

I guess that the upcoming events on certain shows such as "Dawson's Creek," "Spin City," and "Party of Five" will cause more of an uproar out of the office of the racist Reverend, and he will just have to deal with the changing times. In my opinion, the ideas are excellent, and it will be nice to see something different to watch on TV for a change.

Finally, in case you're really stuck for something to watch this weekend, the fifth annual Screen Actors Guild awards will be presented this Sunday on TNT at 8 p.m. (which by the way is the same time that an all new Simpsons is on, so there's no way you should be stuck for something to watch). The awards honor the stars of film and television and there is much more emphasis on the actors and actresses rather than the pictures and shows that they are in.

Nominated for outstanding best male actor in a drama series are: David Duchovny, Anthony Edwards, Dennis Franz, Jimmy Smits and Sam Waterston.

Outstanding female actor in a drama series are: Gillian Anderson, Kim Delany, Christine Lahti, Julianna Margulies and Annie Potts.

Outstanding male actor in a comedy series are: Jason Alexander, Michael J. Fox, Kelsey Grammer, Peter MacNicol and David Hyde Pierce.

And outstanding female actor in a comedy series are: Calista Flockhart, Lisa Kudrow, Julia Louis-Dreyful, Amy Pietz and Tracey Ullman.

My early prediction is that Jimmy Smitts, Kim Delany, Michael J. Fox and Lisa Kudrow will run off with the trophies. At least that's who I would award.

Ordering wine in a restaurant: This also applies to the bottle you buy at Spirit Haus. Just remember, you pay double in a restaurant for the same swill. So don't order the $6 carafe. Consider yourself duly warned.

First, pick out your meal. Do I really need to say it's safer to order white wines with subtle, light dishes, and red wine with strong-flavored ones? In any case, when in doubt, Cabernet Sauvignon and Chardonnay are popular with nearly everyone. Some people turn up their noses at White Zinfandel, but some people love its sweetness.

Many people get this wrong: older wines are not always better. White wines can be gross if they are more than three years old.

When the server brings the wine to the table, she will show you the label. Don't be embarrassed to look at it. Just check to make sure that it is the one you ordered. When the server opens the wine, she may hand you the cork. Do not smell it! I learned the easy way when I was 18 in a bartending course. The lecturer said, "If the customer smells the cork, he's a loser." Okay, she was a bit harsh. Here is the rationale: you feel the cork for dampness to make sure the bottle was stored correctly, on its side.

Tasting wine properly: So the waitress has poured you a glass. First, look at the color of the wine by holding up the glass. Looks good? Good. (brownish tint=bad)

At the same time, check for legs. Those are the rivulets on the side of the glass as you swirl it, once. They indicate sugar and alcohol content. Basically, lots of legs are good (fun fact: some vineyards in France were recently accused adding glycerin to their wine to thicken it, creating more legs).

Smell.

Taste (suck in air to oxidate it if you want, but I'd practice first).

Swirl. Repeat. At some point, give the waitress a nod. See — you can pass for a wine snob already.

What is marrow and why is it so vital?

Marrow is a tissue found in the large bones of the body. It produces vital blood components, such as white cells which fight infection, red cells which carry oxygen, and platelets which prevent bruising and bleeding. Any disease that attacks your marrow may eliminate your body's ability to protect itself.

By providing patients in need compatible marrow, you can give them a second chance at a healthy life. For more information on how to help call The New England Marrow Donor Program at 1-800-676-4545.

Whitmore locked down in face of protest

By Mike Messaros

News

They locked the doors of offices and pulled down the heavy metal door of the Bursar's Office only a few minutes before the protesters arrived at Whitmore Administration Building.

"We've been notified by campus officials that there was going to be a demonstration sometime this week," said Bursar Dan Magaffin, standing in the strangely quiet halls of Whitmore afterward.

The demonstrators started on the steps of the Student Union as various speakers stated the issues.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

A group of protestors assembled in front of the University Admissions Center around 2:30 PM yesterday afternoon.

Speaker after speaker demanded the University reinstate their affirmative action policy, and challenged students walking by to join in their protest.

This event comes after two weeks of growing resentment toward the administration, a manifestation of anger and confusion concerning just how the University of Massachusetts will look over the next few years in terms of diversity.

"We don't need statements," said Michael Tjivikya, a member of the Anti-Racism Coalition, referring to UMass President William M. Bulger's recent email to students, "we need action."

"No policies are being changed," Director of News Office Kay Scanlan said, as the speakers continued behind her. "The administration remains committed to its goal of an entering class that reflects the diversity of high school seniors in Massachusetts."

"There's a misconception that policies are being changed. Policies are not being changed. What is being changed, in a changing legal environment, are the strategies," she said.

Whether or not there is a misconception, it is obvious that the administration and the protesters are ideologically far apart.

"We're trying to show there's an unfair system," said Alex Marcelo, a music major, as he walked along with the crowd to Goodell. "I wouldn't be here if it weren't for affirmative action," he said, "because my [high school] grades weren't good enough. But I'm a senior now, so it's not like I don't work."

Amid shouts of "We won't take it!" they then made their way from Goodell to Whitmore, a thick line of students, faculty and supporters numbering almost 500.

"I had no idea this was going to happen," said student Karen Hanamann, who was sitting in Whitmore when the students came through the door. "I don't know if this is the right place [to protest], but I love to see people standing up for themselves."

Bart Yunker, an undeclared freshman, stood outside watching the line of students file into Whitmore. "I think it's good how they all came together to fight for something. It's a big issue."

The question now: What comes next? Speakers at the Student Union promised to take this to the end, whatever that might be. Two things are obvious: there have been hints at further actions such as building takeovers, and from the look of Whitmore this afternoon, the administration has heard them.

"Both sides have to realize that both sides have the same goal," Scanlan said as she watched the demonstration outside of the Student Union. "Maybe this is part of that dialogue."

Interim Admissions Director Vanessa Rivera speaks to the crowd in front of the University Admissions Center yesterday afternoon.

premature for me to make a statement. I'm sure that in a few weeks I'll be able to do that, and I'll be working with the administration to make sure that we come up with a good admissions policy. Not that the one we have now is not good, but we want to look at anything that may need to be reviewed and come up with an even better admissions policy. We're listening to everyone.

senior Ben Gilbarg a communication major, as protesters entered the Admissions Building.

"I'm extremely mad," said Jennifer Chery, a freshman pre-nursing major who is concerned about her cousins not being able to attend UMass in coming years. "What kind of bullshit is this?"

While the message repeated through chants and signs called for affirmative action to be reinstated, several protesters said ALANA students are not the only ones that will its reap benefits.

"The students feel that this is not fair to the ALANA students, plus the non-ALANA students, because if the ALANA students are decreased, there will be less culture on campus. That will effect the non-ALANA students," said Juan Suarez, a sophomore biology major and president of AHORA.

"I think that every student, regardless of race, sex, social class, etc., should be in support of affirmative action, because rulings like this compromise our education and access to resources for everyone," said Tyanne Muto, a senior anthropology major.

But students weren't the only ones that wanted to see policy changes from the administration.

"This is one of the dumbest things the University has done in a long time. This shows disrespect to the whole campus. The damage the chancellor has done will take years to clear," said Afro-American studies professor John Bracey who came with his son to the protest. "This is unthinkable. The chancellor should call me before he messes up. I would tell you don't do it. This is incompetence of a high order."

Bracey came with his son in mind and in tow.

"I want people like him to be here 10 years from now. I don't want him to be the last generation of African– American students," Bracey said.

"The way they're going about it is ill-advised to say the least... this cannot continue," said Jerry Quarles, special assistant to vice chancellor of student affairs.

I'm supporting the students... I'm hoping the administration [will realize] how strongly people feel about this issue and they will reevaluate what they're doing," Marc Kenen, director of Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

With a call from protest leaders for those that were bystanders yesterday to be protesters today, the rally came to a successful end, according to one participant.

I think it went very well. We got the attention we need... It seemed as if our power was reversed for once," said sophomore Salandra Johnson. "This is just day one... no war is really won in one day."

four colleges stop "dogging UMass."

"The private colleges feel that they don't need to support UMass" been that the Boston Latin School decision only affects public institutions, but warns that "decisions will trickle down to all" of the colleges.

"Smith college hasn't had affirmative action for two years," said Smith.

"Students in the private colleges need to question their schools commitment to affirmative action. Have the faculty and administrators taken a stand in support of UMass?"

"Abolishment of affirmative action is less bloody, but murderous all the same. Question your [private] college. It affects you, the Valley, and the next generation."

Speakers at the rally were as diverse as the crowd made up of a mixture of gender, class, race and age.

Michael Tjivikua of the Anti–Racism Coalition attacked the conservative right–wing he feels permeates our thinking. He further attacked Governor Paul Cellucci for his politics and UMass President William Bulger for his long record of hostility to affirmative action, including his opposition to the school busing program METCO.

UMass graduate student Jon Zibbell questioned the audience on the idea of reverse discrimination. "How can you be a reverse racist if you have no power?

"Individual merit was never the basis for success in America. Harvard whites and other Ivy Leaguers get in because of their parents. Blacks have been systematically discriminated against," Zibbell said.

As the audience grew in size and fervor, Marc Kenen of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) continued on. He told the crowd that there is "only safety in numbers, only safe if you are unified".

Once all the speakers had finished, Student Government Association (SGA) President, Salwa Shamapande led the crowd in a march to Goodell chanting "The people united will never be defeated!"

Recapping his participation in the Goodell takeover two years ago, Kenny Toussant–Lacoste, the former president of the Black Student Union (BSU), took command of the protest shouting through a bullhorn.

The Goodell Takeover was a six–day occupation of students protesting the administrations failure to meet the proposals to diversity they promised in 1992.

Continuing to the Whitmore Administration Building, the students marched through the ground floor of the building chanting and banging on the walls as workers watched behind locked doors and windows.

The march then paused continued on to the Admissions Office where the protestors paused on Haigis Mall and decided to confront the newly appointed Interim Admissions Director Vanessa Rivera. However once at the Admissions Office, students found the building locked. One student in the march shouted out in jest "I want my transcript!"

Within minutes, the doors were finally unlocked and students made their way through the building until Rivera addressed the crowd outside the building over the bullhorn. Surrounded by emotional students holding petitions to reverse the admissions decision, Rivera told the crowd "I do appreciate your concern."

As an alum of UMass and faculty member for two years and as the minority engineering director, Rivera said "I understand your questions, some I may be able to answer and some I may not... this is my second day on the job."

Students urged Rivera to sign their petition to undo the recent admissions decision and when Rivera declined, some became tearful and enraged, while others claimed Rivera was not the one to be focusing on, and it should be others such as Assistant Vice Chancellor of Enrollment Services Joe Marshall or Scott.

As mention ran through the march over a possible stop by the Chancellors House, the protestors came upon Scott in his car on Infirmary Way. Surrounding Scott's car, Toussant– Lacoste asked Scott if he wanted to address the crowd, but Scott declined saying the issue was too complex to get into but that he would like to set up a meeting in the future.

Students allowed Scott to drive away and they ended their march by the W.E.B DuBois Library.

Kiya Stokes, the Graduate Student senator announced a meeting at 7 p.m. tonight in the Colonial Lounge of the Student Union to discuss the issue further.

Another asset is his new marriage to Carmen Electra, he'll always have a pretty face in the crowd.

• If Jerry Reinsdorf hadn't already given the championship rings to the now dismantled Chicago Bulls on several different occasions there would have been no better time to do it than Sunday. On the court you had Scottie Pippen and Rodman, but that is not all. In the stands next to Jack Nicholson was none other than Michael Jordan. You remember him, right?

The trio that brought three championships to the Windy City was together for the first time since that evenful day last June when Jordan made the steal and hit the shot that sealed the fate of Utah Jazz and solidified the Bulls as "Kings of the NBA" yet again.

• The Dallas Mavericks have a problem. The problem is whether to play off–season pickup Steve Nash or Robert Pack at the point. Both produce whenever they are in the game, but what they do on the court is completely different.

Nash brings to the table an average scorer for a point guard and an excellent play maker. Nash also gives opposing point guards headaches with his tenacious defense. You have to love a guy that comes out of the University of California– Santa Clara, a small school that very few people even know exits. It is in the West Coast Conference.

In case you do not know another point guard came out of a small school in the same conference, it being Gonzaga University, and the player being John Stockton. Similar player? You decide.

What Pack gives you is a true scorer at the point guard spot. Whenever you see him at the scorers table ready to check in you better be ready to run the floor. His assist–to– turnover ratio is not what you would want from a point guard, but the points he puts up offer a balance.

• A team to watch out for is the Portland Trail Blazers. The Blazers have the second best record in the Western Conference at 10–4.

Portland has the most balanced offense in the league with six players averaging double figures (Isiah Rider 17.9, Damon Stoudamire 12.6, Rasheed Wallace 12.2, Arvydas Sabonis 12.1, Walt Williams 11.5, and Brian Grant 10.8). Jim Jackson seems to be taking on the role as back up shooting guard well.

One thing the Blazers need to do is trade Jermaine O'Neal. To whom, I don't know, but it needs to be done. The kid (I say this because he skipped college to go to the NBA out of high school) has a giant upside, but he is not getting the playing time that he needs to develop his skills. O'Neal brings youth and excitement to the court, and the Blazers might part with him for a veteran. I would love to see O'Neal play with the Nuggets.

With Raef LaFrentz out for the season with a torn MCL (medial collateral ligament) Denver gets a similar player. The Nuggets could give the Blazers Danny Fortson.

With such a balanced attack the Blazers are climbing to the top of the Pacific Division ahead of the slumping Seattle Sonics, who will welcome swingman Billy Owens back this week.

• Another team that is stepping it up is the Detroit Pistons. Off–season acquisition Christian Laettner is expected to return to the lineup in late March. Laettner has sat out the entire season thus far with a torn achilles suffered in a summer pick–up game.

The inside–outside threat in Laettner's game will relieve some of the load that has been taken on by Grant Hill. Laettner and Hill will be reunited for the first time as teammates since their 1991 and 1992 NCAA Championship years with Duke.

Hill is putting up his usual numbers at 22 points, seven rebounds, and five assists. In Laettner's absence Jerry Stackhouse is tossing in 16 a game. Bison Dele (Brian Williams) and Eric Montross are putting up impressive numbers.

The seemingly ageless Joe Dumars is shooting the lights out again, just as he did in the championship years of 1991 and 1992. If Lyndsey Hunter could become a real point guard the Pistons could shake up the Eastern Conference playoff picture a lot (I know that the season is still young, but with the shortened season and games being played in bunches it is not to early to talk about the playoffs).

In order for the Pistons to remain contenders they need to get a true point guard. I propose they sign Bobby Hurley. Hurley was released by the Grizzlies earlier in the season and would bring solid point guard skills to a team that really needs it. If the Pistons acquire Hurley, the trio of Blue Devils would be together again and maybe bring a banner to the Palace of Auburn Hills just as they did to Cameran Indoor Stadium.

• Allen Iverson... you decide. Can't deny the numbers or the fact that a Collegian big–wig has been nagging me about it for the six hours that it took me to write this.

we've done well since Christmas Break."

The increased offensive output this season only makes Sell an even more dangerous player now. The 6–foot–4 center has not only continued his solid work at the defensive end, but also on the penalty killing unit as well.

"He can fill a lot of roles. He's one of the better checking centers and he kills penalties, which is also kind of unheralded," Mallen said. "We like playing him against the better centers in the league. He uses his size, stick, and body very well. He's willing to pay the price out there in that role, and that calls for a special kind of kid to commit to that."

In addition, Sell is currently tied for the NCAA lead with a host of players with three short–handed goals this season. He also had two tallies last year while UMass was a man short, and poses a strong threat of lighting the lamp whenever the Minutemen are shorthanded.

"The shorthanded goals are more or less about getting the bounces," Sell said. "Every time we've got one, whether it be Jeff [Blanchard] or Ray [Geever], we've all gotten the bounces."

Coming into the season, Sell also had an even more important role for the Minutemen as one of only a handful of upperclassmen who log ice time for UMass. Now, with only one game remaining in the regular season, it appears that No. 20 has done his part in helping the Maroon and White return to the Hockey East playoffs after a one–year hiatus.

"He's a quiet leader, a guy who leads more by example on the ice," said Mallen of Sell. "In what he's done, as far as game–winning goals and killing penalties, those are things that the other guys take notice of."

Said Sell in agreement: "I try to keep the guys motivated and focused. More or less I try to lead by example, giving the young guys a pat on the back for the little things they do wrong."

With tomorrow's regular season finale with Merrimack lying on the immediate horizon before the Hockey East playoffs begin next weekend, Sell will be sure to do his best to try and help the Minutemen advance as far as possible in the postseason.

"We're either going to face Maine, UNH or BC. We know that we can play with either one of them," he said. "We already proved that we can play with Maine, but we still have a bad taste in our mouths from the UNH and BC games."

And hopefully for Sell and the Minutemen, that sour taste will turn pretty sweet when playoff time comes around.

UM freshmen ski duo shines bright

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

With one meet to go, it can be safely said that the Massachusetts skiing program has taken a turn for the better.

A bumper crop of flying freshmen have injected both of UMass' downhill squads with keen talent and boundless enthusiasm. At the head of that class stand Ken Thoman and Lauren Brodey, two young daredevils with a lot more in common than Maroon and White jackets.

"Ken's been a pain in my butt for four years now," laughs Brodey. "But no way did I ever picture us on the same college team."

Though the two New York natives have competed independently in the same sanctioned races for years, their paths didn't truly cross until both were students at the Killington Mountain School in Vermont. Later, the pair attended summer camp at Oregon's Mount Hood. Since then, they've shared a mutual respect that mirrors their love for the sport.

"We're constantly pumping each other up, pushing each other to go faster," Thoman said. "It's become a sort of pre– run tradition."

With nearly two decades of competition experience between them, it's sometimes hard to remember that these two are rookies. Despite practically growing up on skis, Brodey more often than not finds herself the youngest racer on the mountain. In fact, she and Boston College's Christina Gush were the youngest skiers in the conference to finish in the top 15 this season.

Thoman, meanwhile, has reduced his youth to a mere footnote by crushing all comers in the giant slalom. A top– 10 finish at the season–culminating tournament in California next weekend would be Thoman's eighth such run this year, solidifying his place among college skiing's brightest stars.

"Right now, it's all about Cali.," Thoman said. "I don't think I've ever been this psyched for a tournament."

That statement probably spells doom for the rest of the GS field at Nationals, as Thoman hasn't exactly lacked for competitive fire during his first year at UMass.

"His starts are usually accompanied by a big roar as he comes out of the gate," Brodey said. "I just smile, and say 'here comes Ken!'"

Interestingly, these young racers have a lot more on their minds than just racing through the present. While the two have fit seamlessly into coach Bill MacConnell's scheme of total team skiing, their extensive track records in individual competition have spawned countless ideas concerning the future improvement of UMass' program.

"I'd like to see the teams gain a little more structure in the future," Brodey said. "Things like mandatory practices would really help bring us closer together."

Said Thoman: "Our team is really fit physically, but simply lacks ski racing experience. Ninety percent of this team has only high school racing to look back on, and that doesn't cut it at this level."

What does "cut it" is combining natural talent with hard work, an idea that Brodey and Thoman are already embracing. While each followed a carefully structured training regime during the off–season, both have upped the ante for this summer's workouts by incorporating plyometrics, swimming and even cardio–kickboxing into their training plans.

"My goal is total body fitness through cross–training," said Thoman, who uses alternative sports like rock climbing to strengthen some less–developed muscle groups. "Even basketball improves your skiing, with all the emphasis on lateral movement."

Brodey will look to a program of running and weight training, combined with countless hours in the pool, to boost her conditioning and performance.

"I had to endure double swim practices all last summer," Brodey said. "I actually debated going to school for swimming."

Luckily for UMass, both Brodey and Thoman elected to bring their unique blend of spirit and talent here to compete. And while their presence on the slopes spells trouble for the rest of the college field, they've definitely given UMass skiing a big push in the right direction.

Women's track has a positive finish

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's indoor track and field team ended its season on a positive note last weekend with an 18th–place finish at the ECAC Championships. The 14 points that they racked up was good enough to place them in front of 25 other schools at the meet.

The Minutewomen were led by post–grad Rosey Bryan. Bryan turned in an all–around performance that was unmatched. She won the 55m high hurdles with a time of 7.94 seconds. She also placed second in the 200m with a time of 25.52 seconds. Before her weekend was finished she took third in the triple jump with a jump of a little over 38 feet.

Nicole Way continued her stellar campaign by placing second in the 1,000m with a season best time of 2:50.59. This was not only a season best, but also a career best which broke the school record that was set in 1992 by Rebecca Johnson (2:51.47).

Other top performers were junior Andrea Comeau, who finished fifth in the pentathlon with 3,536 total points. Comeau is the only member of the Minutewomen whose season is not over. She will travel to the NCAA Championships in Indianapolis, Ind. this weekend to compete for the national championship in the high jump.

Junior Melissa Ward also finished 11th in the pentathlon with 3,326 total points. Shelanda Irish placed eighth in the long jump with a mark of nearly 19 feet. The senior then stepped up to compete in the distance medley. She ran the 800m leg, a distance that was new to her, yet still helped the Minutewomen to a season best time of 11:58.64 and an eighth–place spot.

The first season of the pole vault came to a close with the three freshmen having identical vaults of around nine and half feet. Rhianna DaCruz, Heather Palmer and Johanna Lelke, the future for the Minutewomen pole vaulters, will look to better their heights for next season. However, for their first time, just qualifying for the ECACs was an outstanding accomplishment.

Women's soccer team signs new recruits

Freshmen hoping to have an immediate impact

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The rich just got a little richer.

For a program that has made 10 trips to the NCAA tournament and graduated only two players from its 1998 team, you could venture to guess that the Massachusetts women's soccer team was already pretty well set for the 1999 season.

Well, guess again.

Although the Minutewomen will return everyone except Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Sophie Lecot and A-10 First Team pick Amanda Thompson, that didn't stop coach Jim Rudy and assistant Rachel LeDuc from bringing in four new talented players for the upcoming season. The Class of 2003 will include Melissa Ganias, Maggie LaBrode, Alexi Rudd and Holly Wilderhaus.

"I'm very pleased that we got who we got. We didn't really miss on too much," Rudy said. "We targeted some people in particular and went after them strongly in our own way. We told them that they were on our blue-chip list and that if they wanted to come here, then we would be happy to make an early agreement with them."

All four players signed national letters of intent to commit to UMass during the course of February.

A true All-American

Ganias, a midfielder from Mark T. Sheehan High in Wallingford, Conn., was an All-American during her senior year for the Titans. During her four-year career, Ganias tallied 45 goals and added 58 assists, while her teams combined for a 57-6-7 record.

"She is a multi-talented player who can play in either the midfield or the back," said Rudy of Ganias. "And the more we watched her play, the more we came to appreciate her tactical ability at reading the game, seeing the field and making quick decisions. She is a very smart player."

Also a two-time All-New England and four-time All-State selection, Ganias picked UMass over St. John's, New Hampshire and James Madison. The former Titan star also had several family ties to Amherst, as her father and two cousins also attended UMass.

"When I took my visit the team seemed to get along really good and I liked coach," Ganias said. "Another reason, which wasn't the main reason though, was that my dad went there. That was kind of nice to know."

Although Rudy isn't sure where Ganias will play just yet, she doesn't really have any preference at this point.

"It doesn't matter where I play, either defense or midfield," she said. "I don't mind either [position]. Hopefully I'll work really hard over the next four years and continue to improve."

A local product stays close to home

LaBrode, who hails from Palmer, made her mark on Western Massachusetts during her five-year career at PHS, notching 72 goals and 35 assists. In her senior year, the Panthers' star was the Division II Most Valuable Player.

"She's got great potential and is a kid who works and trains very hard on her own," said Rudy of LaBrode. "She's fast, has good size, and can score goals. My feeling about her is that she may have an impact right away, but if not her first year, definitely by her second year."

There is no question that LaBrode is a speedster, as she holds the PHS record in the 200m and was an All-Western Mass. selection in track last spring.

"We're looking at her as a potential front running mate with Kara [Green], or maybe as an attacking midfielder, or maybe as a defender," Rudy said. "We're not sure yet."

Even though Rudy hasn't found a permanent home for LaBrode yet, that really doesn't seem to bother her.

"I'm not really picky. I'm just looking forward to playing and starting," she said. "I don't care where. Coach won't hear any complaints from me."

In the end, the fact that the former Panthers' standout grew up only a short ride from campus provided another sense of comfort.

"When I visited [the school] I felt very comfortable. The campus was great and the team made me feel wanted," LaBrode said. "Being only 20 minutes away is really exciting because hopefully some of my fans will come down and watch me play."

A long, cross country journey

Orinda, Ca. is a long ways away from Amherst, but the distance really doesn't seem to bother Rudd. A multi- dimensional player at Miramonte High School, Rudd comes from the same club team as former UMass All-American Erica Iverson.

"Alexi has great speed and the ability to match up against the other team's best player," Rudy said. "She's a feisty player who has some possibilities as a frontrunner. She has good ups, but I probably see her in the back. It will be nice to have a fast defense for once."

The Minutewomen won the services of Rudd over schools such as Clemson, Portland, Santa Barbara and the University of Hartford.

"My coach [John Tomei] suggested UMass to me, and when I came out here for my visit the people seemed very friendly," Rudd said.

Rudd also agreed with Rudy's comments in regards to her individual strengths.

"My main skill that sets me apart is my speed, but I also think that I'm pretty versatile," she said. "While I'm in school I just want to figure out what I want to do as far as a major, continue to improve on my soccer skills and have fun."

Birds of a feather flock together

An interesting fact about the discovery of Wildenhaus, a Centerville, Ohio native, was the fact that she was recommended to Rudy by former UMass standout Rebecca Myers, currently the assistant coach at the University of Dayton.

"We went and saw her play twice when we were out there, at Dayton. She is a strong, physical player with above average speed," Rudy said. "She played center midfield in high school, but we see her playing defense here at UMass. She's strong and gritty as well as a fierce defender."

Wildenhaus was a three-time Western Ohio League selection at Centerville High, scoring 23 goals and chipping in 25 assists during her career.

UMass won the recruiting battle over Dayton and the University of North Carolina-Charlotte. Wildenhaus is the second incoming freshman in as many years [Sarah Cook being the other] that has chosen to play Atlantic 10 soccer for the Minutewomen rather than a Dayton program that is in close proximity to their homes.

"I wanted to get away from home, and UD was only 15 minutes from my house," Wildenhaus said. "The team atmosphere at UMass was different then the other schools I visited. I felt there was a lot more team chemistry at UMass."

Wildenhaus, who plans to major in nursing, appears to be looking forward toward her collegiate career.

"I'm hoping to contribute by bringing quickness and with my distribution and aggressiveness in the back," she said. "I want to become a better player, but I also want to help the team out as much as I can in any possible way."

A very bright future lies ahead

After missing out on winning the A-10s and qualifying for the NCAA tournament last year, it's almost a given that the Minutewomen will improve on that 10-11 mark this season.

In addition to the new recruits, UMass will also see the return of Robin Smith, Kate Webb and Martha Conover in the back, as well as Brooke Bartlett up front, from injuries. Needless to say, the boost that this mix of old and new faces will provide is going to be evident right off the bat.

"This is going to create an interesting dynamic. We have a group of people who are injured that are coming back and are rehabbing very well. Then we have a group of people who took their spots last year and gained a lot of experience," Rudy said. "Now we have three people in particular who we recruited for the purpose of [suring up our defense [with the fourth slated for another position]."

"The battle for positions is going to be awesome," added Rudy. "There's going to be so much flexibility between the returning and the new players that the possibilities of a starting lineup are fun to think about, but impossible to predict."

As for the immediate future, the Minutewomen will open up their spring season on Saturday in an indoor tournament that will take place at the All-Sport Arena in Northampton. UMass will take on the Boston Bolts at 3:45 p.m., Marist College at 4:25 p.m. and Northeastern University at 6:30 p.m. The semifinals and finals will then take place at 7:15 p.m. and 8:20 p.m., respectively.

"We've really been training hard for this. We're looking at it as an event that we need to do well in," Rudy said. "We need to start off our spring season on the right foot after what happened in the fall."

Senior Way is a success both on and off the track

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

Nicole Way is an athlete for all seasons. She competes in cross country as well as indoor and outdoor track. Just in case that is not enough, she double majors in exercise science and sports management. The senior star has one year of eligibility left for cross country, so she will be returning to campus in the fall to compete and to finish her degree.

She states that deciding to double major in her sophomore year as the reason for having to return for a fifth year.

Leading by example is the way she likes to do it. The senior distance runner has quietly put together a season to remember, but speaks higher of her teammates than of her individual accomplishments.

"We only have eight scholarships to give out each year," Way said. "Even the walk-ons feel comfortable coming here [UMass] because they know they will be competing at a top level program."

Eight scholarships is minimal for a Division I program, but UMass has shown no ill effects of their lack of awards.

Coach Ken O'Brien enticed Way to bring her skills to Amherst after graduating from Barnstable High School. It also helped that her brother, Jon Way, was a runner at UMass in making her final decision.

Way was recruited by the UMass staff as a triple jumper, but after a back injury in her sophomore year she went to coach Julie LaFreniere to ask if she could change her focus to distance.

"I thought Julie would laugh at me, but she didn't. She has confidence in her athletes. She tells us to believe in ourselves," Way said.

Becoming a distance runner has proved to be a great move for Way. She competes in the 800 and 1,000m as well as the mile and the distance medley.

Way finished off her indoor track career on a high note. In her final meet as a Minutewoman she broke the school record in the 1,000m. The old record was set in 1992 by Rebecca Johnson with a time of 2:51.47. Way left that record in the dust, breaking it with time of 2:50.59. She set high goals for herself at the beginning of the season and feels like she accomplished them all.

Breaking the record in her last meet was sweet enough for Way, but for it to come in the ECAC Championships made it that much more special.

"Julie told me right away that I couldn't run with the girl that was the favorite," Way said. "If I did I probably wouldn't have finished the race."

In addition, Way couldn't speak highly enough LaFreniere's honesty.

"We [the team] trust her opinions," she said. "When coach said I couldn't run with her, she was right."

Not to be forgotten, Way took Atlantic 10 Performer of the Year home after her showing at that meet. It is that honor that she is most proud of. She won the mile and the 1,000m with times of 5:03.31 and 2:53.78, respectively, then anchored the distance medley winners.

"I never had a chance. I would have been disappointed had I not won it. It is flattering to be recognized by the other coaches of the A-10," Way said.

For her performance in this meet as well as her showing in the New England Championships she was named WHMP Athlete of the Week for the weeks of Feb. 17 and 24.

"It's great to receive the Athlete of the Week. I'm proud that it brings recognition to the track team," Way said.

The quiet star does have one problem though. The problem is that UMass does not have an indoor track facility that allows it to host practice, let alone meets.

"We need a track," she said. "We go to other schools and they're all rooting against us. If we had a track we could get a following just as the other schools do. We had one home cross country meet in the fall and we had a lot of fans. It was great to see them come out to support us."

But even though running takes up so much time, Way does not regret her dedication to the sport.

"I didn't think about it much until it was over. I have a lot of memories with the track team that will last a longer than those of coming home at six in the morning after a night of partying," Way said.

Despite competing in three sports and academically taking on a double major, Nicole Way has managed to stand above the rest both in and out of the classroom.

Celtics rebound from a slow start with a terrific weekend

Jason Owens

Crawling home after a 86-73 loss to the Washington Wizards that featured poor play and on-court bickering between the team captain and its point guard, the Boston Celtics looked like a group poised to self-destruct. It turns out that all they really needed was a little home cooking.

While bouncing back from a road trip that could only be described as discouraging, the Celtics beat two of the top three teams in the Atlantic Conference in the span of three days. These were not just victories either — they were convincing, professional thrustlings applied to the supposed class of the division.

Celtics fans, days ago depressed by what looked like a very large hill to climb, can now breath a collective sigh of relief. Things are going to be alright.

The wins against the Knicks and Magic, followed by Saturday's solid 101-92 victory over the Nets, put the Celtics at 6-5. Standing at one game above .500, coach Rick Pitino may have cleared the first major hurdle of the season.

Many around the Celtics franchise feared the early schedule would short circuit the Celtics season before it started. They feared an out-of-shape team unable to use its vaunted press and forced to play seven of its first 11 games on the road would dig itself a whole so deep that it would never recover. For a while there, it looked like their fears were well founded. Not anymore.

The Celtics have apparently weathered the storm. They have finally found the elusive offensive continuity that they'd been searching for with little success in their first nine games. Kenny Anderson and captain Antoine Walker, just a few nights ago at each other's throats, have managed to put their differences aside and gel, and super-rookie Paul Pierce, incredible and downright unstoppable in nearly every game, at last has some teammates who are ready to help him out.

The win over Orlando, a 111-79 annihilation of the Atlantic leaders, would have been a good excuse for the Celtics to let down against the Knicks. After all, Ron Mercer, a big factor two nights earlier in the Orlando win, was out with a sprained ankle, and the Knicks have, quite literally, owned the C's in recent years. Last year, the C's put an end to a 19-game losing streak to the Knicks, and they proved Friday night that, at least in the world of professional basketball, Boston is no longer New York's whipping boy.

Pierce and Walker each had 24 points, with the Celtics' captain also pulling down 11 boards and dishing out five assists. The game wasn't all smooth sailing, as more than once it looked as if the Celtics were going to give the game away, allowing 17-point leads dwindle to as little as five and momentum to shift in the Knicks favor. Then some unlikely characters came to the rescue.

The Knicks game proved to be one of the first times in the young season that the C's demonstrated the fact that they have a deep, talented bench. Bruce Bowen, Dana Barros, Andrew Declercq and Greg Minor harassed and confused New York guards, most notably back up point guard Chris Childs, who picked up two offensive fouls trying to get open against the Celtics full court press. They scrambled, created turnovers and fast breaks, and disrupted New York's half- court game.

It was the C's starters, with the exception of Pierce, who allowed the Knicks to get into their half-court offense and back into the game practically every quarter. It was the Celtics bench which turned back each New York attack, simply out-running a Knick team that had played a tough overtime game the night before.

The Celtics' subsequent victory over the Nets demonstrated just how easy it is for young, talented teams to fall into a rut, as New Jersey, predicted by many to be a factor in the Atlantic playoff race this year, has done so far this season. The Nets, who arguably have an much or more talent than the Celtics, have stunk it up thus far. Their loss on Saturday dropped them to 2-10.

If the Celtics had lost a triple-overtime game in Vancouver a couple of weeks ago, they could have found themselves in the same position as the Nets, but luckily for Celtics fans, they didn't and haven't.

There is another important distinction to be made between the Nets and Celtics. While both teams are coached by young, hot-shot Italians who thrived in the college environment, and both squads are peppered with good, young talent, it is the Celtics who seem to have bought into their coach's system hook, line and sinker.

While coaches around the league deal with immature, undisciplined and uncooperative players, Pitino has managed to focus his team in a specific direction, getting them to believe in him and themselves. Now that the wheels are greased and turning, they seem ready to make a move.

Before Celtics fans can begin winking at each other and patting one another on the back, they should take a gander at the C's upcoming schedule. It is not a pretty sight. The Celtics have six home games in March against 11 away. In one stretch they play five games in seven nights — all of them on the road.

Still, aside from a couple Sunday afternoon dates with Larry Bird's Pacers and a rematch with the Knicks in New York at mid-month, the quality of the Celtics' opponents isn't overwhelming. They stay out of the west, which, for the time being, seems to boast the better conference, and spends a good stretch playing teams from the Central Division, which isn't as strong as the Atlantic.

For now, Celtics Nation is smiling, and all is well. The future, once terrifying to fans of the green, is now tolerable if not yet rosy. Regardless, any fan feeling particularly depressed about the Celtics' March road woes can sneak a peak at the team's April schedule and think back to last weekend's win over the Knicks. There are 12 April home games on Boston's schedule.

It is not too difficult to imagine a well-conditioned and coordinated team, pressing like crazy, playing in a loud and intense FleetCenter, creating more than a little trouble for teams as the playoffs loom tantalizingly on the horizon. All they have to do is get through March alive.

Men's gym faces Army tomorrow

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

This weekend, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team has a tough weekend ahead of it. The Minutemen will compete in their last home meet of the season on Friday and then tackle the New England Championships on Sunday. On Friday, the Minutemen take on the Army, a familiar foe for UMass.

"I think we'll do well," Massachusetts coach Roy Johnson said. "[Junior] Jeff LaVallee is in great shape, and [senior] Steve Pryor is feeling a lot better, and will be ready to compete."

Pryor is one of five seniors that UMass will be losing this year. Pryor has been one of the most consistent members of the team, winning Athlete of the Week five times, leading most of the competitions last season, and pushing the Minutemen along this year.

Last year, Pryor broke the all-time high all-around score with a 57.825 and holds the second place all time score on high bar (9.80), third place spot on parallel bars (9.70), and fourth on rings (9.875).

Also on the list of seniors are Phil Lieberman, Mike Plourde, Brad LeClair and Dan Young. Lieberman took the EIGL title on floor exercise in 1997 and holds the all-time UMass record on the event with a 9.875, and with his high-flying release moves, is in a three-way time for the second-place high score on high bar (9.80).

Plourde was co-captain of the Minutemen last season and is in a two-way tie for the fourth-place high score on the floor exercise (9.750). That score also earned Plourde a spot at NCAA Regionals last year.

LeClair is best known for his swing on the pommel horse, where he is tied Pryor for third place with a 9.80. LeClair won the New England Championships on the event with a 9.70, and later represented UMass at NCAA Regionals.

Young has certainly been a strong competitor for UMass, taking the ninth all-time high score on rings (9.650) and sixth on high bar (9.60). Young has had a career best all-around score of 52.60 and continues to score at the top on the floor exercise. He also shows his strength on the still rings, scoring a high 9.675 last weekend.

With solid team members like the seniors, Johnson has high hopes for his team.

"We've been improving over the past week," Johnson said. "We're looking much better on floor, and I think we'll have a little surprise on rings this weekend. Andy Leis is looking a lot better, and will probably be competing on high bar and pommel horse. And Jeff LaVallee, who's ranked fourth in the nation in the all-around, is really going to help us out."

LaVallee was named Athlete of the Week yesterday — another award that this stellar athlete can add to his growing collection.

UMass has some mighty big shoes to fill when it loses these tough competitors, but will focus on both winning against Army, and taking its 11th-straight title as New England Champion. UMass takes on Army tomorrow at 7 p.m. in Bowden Gymnasium and goes to the Blake Arena in Springfield for the New England Championships on Sunday at 6 p.m.

UM women's tennis splits a pair

By Matt O'Neill
Collegian Correspondent

It was a tale of two matches for the Massachusetts women's tennis team last weekend. The team recorded both a victory and a defeat in matches against Fordham and Brown.

Against Atlantic 10 foe Fordham, the Minutewomen came away with a enormous victory by a 7-2 score. With the win, coach Judy Dixon's squad got its first win for the spring season.

"This was a big win for us," Dixon said. "The win all but assures us the second seed in the A-10 tournament."

According to Dixon, the Rams came into the match expecting to come away with a loss.

"They came into the match expecting to lose," Dixon said. "They were not prepared to fight it out."

All but one of the singles players came away with a win on Friday. Dixon praised the play of Annie Hamilton and April Madani.

"Annie Hamilton played well, she played No. 2 with a 102-degree temperature," Dixon said. "April Madani was also a key win for us. She stepped up and played No. 6 and won in her first match since September."

Saturday, however, was a different story for the Minutewomen. The team came away with 8-1 defeat at the hands of the No. 15 Bears.

However, Dixon felt that her team put forth a great effort.

"We played well, all of our matches were played very hard," she said.

Ola Gerasimova came away with the only victory of the match for the Minutewomen.

"Ola played well, she battled through the flu to come away a 6-4, 6-3, two-set win," Dixon said.

The one point against Brown was the first for the team in three attempts against Ivy League schools this year.

Dixon felt that the play of No. 4 singles player Robin Lebovitz was one of the bright spots for the team.

"Robin played one her best matches since she has been here," Dixon said. "She was more aggressive and stuck to her new style well. This match was huge in her development [as a player]."

While the results from the two matches over the weekend were drastically different, they both proved to be learning experience for the young team.

"These last couple of matches really brought the team together," Dixon said. "When we are all healthy, this team will be very good."

The evening's selections are both secular and liturgical and include works by Rachmaninoff, Borodin, Saint-Saëns, and Schubert. "The loveliest sounds made by human beings . . ." – THE WASHINGTON POST

Fleury deal is a sour one for Avs; more NHL news

This week the Colorado Avalanche made one of the biggest blockbuster deals of the decade this week when they traded Rene Corbet and Wade Belak to the Calgary Flames for Theo Fleury, who has collected 31 goals and 39 assists this season. However, immediately after being traded to Colorado, Fleury was injured and lost indefinitely.

Paul Teves

Since the 1989–1990 season, Fleury had played in over 700 NHL games and missed only seven due to injury, but now the Avalanche will have to hope for a miracle if he is to return for the playoffs.

The Avalanche have said publicly that they don't know right now when Fleury will return, but they said that they know he is a quick healer. You have to feel for the Avalanche, but don't feel too bad. They still are in third place in the Western Conference and they still have Peter Forsberg, Joe Sakic, Valeri Kamensky and Claude Lemieux. Don't forget Sandis Ozolinsh on defense, and in net, the legendary Patrick Roy.

• The first game the Flames played in the post–Fleury era was a 2–1 loss to the Sharks. Following the loss, the recently re–signed Phil Housley said that they are still in a playoff race and will have to deal without Theo despite missing his offensive punch.

• In terms on the Bruins, I would just like to say that their sub–par season to this point disgusts me. Despite the fact that they have picked it up over the last five games, they made another bonehead maneuver, like Boston teams do: they didn't sign Jim Carey

If you remember last year I wrote a column after the Bruins were eliminated from the playoffs about how Byron Dafoe is not a Stanley Cup goalie. This means that Dafoe isn't a goalie that can go on a hot streak and win a cup.

Carey was recently signed by the St. Louis Blues. Carey was 17–8 this season in Providence, and had a GAA of 2.11. Carey will come back as every so–called has–been that left the Boston area teams has done. Carey will end up some day with a shutout against the Bruins in game seven of the Stanley Cup Finals. But that would mean that the Bruins would make the Finals (not likely).

• The Nashville Predators have been struggling for a couple of months and their woes continued right through the end of last month. That's what you get for starting a NHL program in Tennessee. They went 0–4–1 at home in February, and haven't won a home game since mid–January.

Don't get me wrong, I love the Volunteer State, but it's not built for hockey. It's built for Division I–AA football teams winning national championships. Nashville has fallen from middle of the playoff pack in September to 11th place in the conference right now.

• In Vancouver, the Canucks will be benefitting from the return of Mattias Ohlund and Alexander Mogilny from injury yesterday, and are now looking forward to the return of captain Mark Messier. The returning members of the Canucks should provide an offensive spark for the struggling Vancouver team, who currently sit in last place in the conference (19–33–9).

• Dominik Hasek will miss his sixth consecutive game, with soreness in his groin. The Sabres, at 2–1–2 in his absence, are not looking to bring him back to fast. After all, Hasek will be the key to any sort of title run for the Sabres.

• Petr Nedved has done a great job for the New York Rangers since replacing Wayne Gretzky at center. Nedved has three goals and three assists since replacing the future Hall–of–Famer and legend on the top line.

• The good news for the Bruins is the emergence of Cameron Mann, who only scored one point over 19 games, but has scored five goals in the last four. I would attribute the Bruins recent found success to Mann's personal success. But don't worry, the Bruins will trade him away for some random aging, over–the–hill, injury prone defenseman.

• One final note to watch out for in my sleeper in the Western Conference. The Anheim Mighty Ducks are currently in fifth place and will be moving up as long as Teemu Selanne and Paul Kariya keep lighting the lamp the way they have been. The Ducks, with one more acquisition, will be among the teams to beat in the NHL's Western Conference.

UMass downs Duquesne, 80–70

Minutemen will play Xavier in A–10 quarters

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — Before the word frustrating is used to describe the season that the Massachusetts men's basketball team is having, one might first look at the season of the Duquesne Dukes as a reference point.

After recording an 11–19 overall record in the 1997–98 season, UMass' opening round opponent in the Atlantic 10 tournament spent this season collecting only five victories.

That's how the Dukes entered the conference championships, a tourney where records are discarded and anyone involved has a fair shot at winning the title and a bid to the NCAA tournament.

Despite all of their hard work in heroic antics, particularly on the part of sophomore guard Courtney Wallace, who scored 26 acrobatic points, Duquesne still watched Massachusetts advance to the second round with an 80–70 victory.

"We came to the tournament to win the tournament," Dukes coach Darelle Porter said. "We're disappointed because we gave the effort just like we had all season, but some of our shots didn't fall and we couldn't score enough points to win."

The Minutemen, who have been blasted and criticized for what has been viewed as a sub par 13–15 season, needed a strong second half to pick up the victory.

Having ended the first half on an electrifying Wallace lay– in which gave Duquesne a 30–28 lead, the underdog Dukes were welcomed into the second period by a 9–0 UMass run to rip that advantage away.

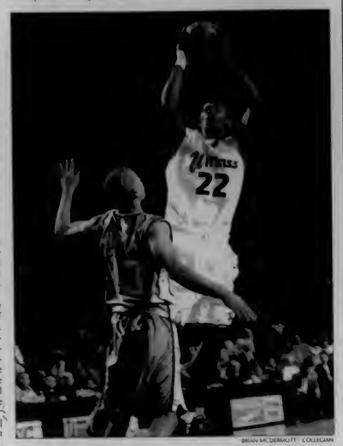
The Dukes fought back, however, capitalizing on a stretch of time during which UMass senior point guard Charlton Clarke went to the bench after reaggravating a stress fracture in his foot. From there, the Dukes scored an eight straight to take a 38–37 lead.

"They're just like everyone else here," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said. "This is a second season for them, so we knew they were going to play hard."

The two teams traded shots to tie the score 43–43, before UMass guard Monty Mack went on one of several offensive tears — this time hitting a three–pointer to initiate a 7–0 UMass run that included five points by the junior.

Mack, a second team All–Conference performer who would bury six shots from behind the arc on his way to a game–high 27 points, also neutralized Wallace's play in the process.

While Mack controlled the perimeter, senior center Lari Ketner dominated the paint. Ketner easily outmuscled the Duquesne post players for 18 points and 11 rebounds on the afternoon.



Still, while Flint can emphasize with the plight of the Dukes, there is a sense of urgency as he will lead his team into a second–round matchup with Xavier with Clarke's status questionable.

If Clarke misses today's game, he will be replaced by a young duo of Rafael Cruz and Jonathan DePina. Clarke's loss would create problems against Xavier, whose aggressive defense, led by recently anointed A–10 Defensive Player of the Year James Posey, could terrorize the somewhat inexperienced guards. Regardless, Flint will be prepared.

"We just played them [Xavier] two weeks ago, so we know what Xavier is going to do," Flint said. "They're going to press you all over the floor, and they're going to do those types of things."

In their only game against the Musketeers this season, UMass took Xavier into double overtime before winning 78– 77. Now they must face their rivals, complete with All– Conference performers Posey and Lenny Brown, in the tournament, where adrenaline will be running high.

If the Minutemen can oust Xavier, they will take on the winner of the matchup between Eastern Division champion Temple and Virginia Tech on Friday night.

Chris Kirkland and the Massachusetts men's basketball team advanced to the quarterfinals of the A–10 tournament with an 80–70 win over Duquesne yesterday.

Plenty of news and notes from the hoop world

Dominique Wilkins, move over to the next to last seat on the Orlando Magic bench next to your brother Gerald. Another thing, your nickname as the "Human Highlight Reel" has been taken over.

Bryan Smith
on
The NBA

I bestow that nickname on Sacramento Kings rookie guard Jayson Williams. A couple of years ago ESPN had commercials that had people saying, "That's my Sportscenter highlight." Williams, in under a month, has found himself having many Sportscenter highlights.

The new "Human Highlight Reel" helped the Kings to get off to a strong start, but they have been slumping of late. Their recent slump has nothing to do with the play of Williams or that of forward Chris Webber.

Webber, who was acquired for the aging Mitch Richmond, seems to be becoming the player that was drafted first overall in 1993. Even if Webber did say that "I'even my mother's cooking would not make Sacramento a good place to play," his numbers are speaking louder than his words.

With Webber finally becoming the player that everyone expected and Williams showing moves that most find unthinkable, the upstart Kings are taking the NBA by storm. Two other moves that are paying dividends for Sacramento are signing Corliss Williamson to a one–year, $500,000 contract and picking up Vlade Divac.

Williamson gives a wide body inside and takes some pressure off of Webber. Divac brings solid production to a rejuvenated front line. He can step outside and make a 15– foot jump shot with ease which opens up the lane for Williams and Webber. Divac is averaging a double–double (11.4 points and 10.4 rebounds).

• Personal injury attorney Mark E. Solomon (you may have seen his adds on television) may be getting a call from Heat coach Pat Riley about Alonzo Mourning's ailing back. It must be hurting at this point. With the Heat playing without Jamal Mashburn and Veshon Leonard, they have turned to Mourning to carry the offensive load, and the center has risen to the task.

Mourning has turned over a new leaf this season. The thug that got in a fight with former Charlotte teammate, Larry Johnson (now with the Knicks) in last year's playoffs and got suspended for the fifth and deciding game of that series is over.

Now, the new 'Zo is taking the bumps and bangs of the physical play of NBA low–post players with a grain of salt. The hard fouls that he draws, that used to make him a nonfactor, are no longer. They are fueling him. He is now going to the line and making other teams pay for fouling him by making his free throws. Before, Mourning could be seen on Friday Night Fights slugging it out with there directing. It might be a gametime decision tomorrow."

Even after the game it was evident that Clarke was in obvious discomfort. But as the captain of his team, he attempted to deflect attention to his injury. Instead, he tried to focus his team's mindset on tomorrow's game and who might replace him.

Although DePina saw extended minutes in the second half, Flint will likely use Cruz in Clarke's absence. The sophomore guard finished with five points. Flint was also impressed with his 5–for–6 performance from the free–throw line.

Clarke's injured foot causes worries for UM

By Aaron Soykin
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — It was only a matter of time before Charlton Clarke's broken foot gave out on him. He had been fighting severe pain for the past 10 games, but in yesterday's win 80–70 over Duquesne, the pain won the battle.

With UMass ahead by seven points near the beginning of the second half, Clarke pivoted awkwardly on his injured foot, aggravating the stress fracture so badly that he did not return for the remainder of the game.

Immediately after his exit, the Dukes responded with an 8– 0 run, stealing the lead, 38–37.

"Yeah, I guess [he's hurt pretty bad]," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said of Clarke. "If he's not here, we've got to play without him."

After Clarke's departure junior Monty Mack carried the Minutemen in the closing frame. The South Boston native scored 18 of his game–high 27 points in the second half to help UMass extend its season for at least one more game.

"We just had to go out there and play hard [after Clarke's departure]," Mack said. "I've got confidence in all our backcourt players. We've just got to come in and play our game like we know how to play."

As for Clarke, his status is now very uncertain. He grimaced in pain when he hobbled off the court for perhaps the final time. And with Xavier as its next opponent, UMass can ill–afford to deal with an injury of this magnitude.

As a team that utilizes a full–court press almost the entire game, the Musketeers will provide a tempo to which a hampered Clarke will have trouble adjusting. Nevertheless, the senior captain still believes that he can attempt at playing in the quarterfinals today.

"I have a bone stimulator that I put on my foot that's supposed to be helping me out, but everything else has to come from guts," Clarke said. "That's a game [today's game] that you should want to live for. It's to advance — if you lose, you go home."

PREVIEW

Despite the severity of the pain, this was not the only occasion in which Clarke has aggravated the foot. Three weeks ago at George Washington, the senior guard collided with a Colonial player and sat out the second half. Yesterday's incident was somewhat similar.

"I took a bad turn today and I aggravated it in a big way," Clarke said. "It was just a bad cut, a bad pivot."

Clarke could not speculate on whether or not he will be able to play in any capacity today. He did, however, express confidence in the ability of the younger Minutemen reserves. Sharing the point guard duties yesterday were sophomores Rafel Cruz and Jonathan DePina, who were to handle to the Dukes pressure and help UMass pull away to the 10–point victory.

"Guys came off the bench and gave us a good spark, like Jonathan, Rafael and even Winston [Smith]," Clarke said.

Even Flint admitted that Clarke's playing status may be in serious jeopardy for today's quarterfinal game against the Musketeers.

Although aware of his captain's high threshold for pain, Flint realized that Clarke's presence likely hurt his team more than it would help it.

"That's why he didn't play in the second half. I didn't play him because he couldn't guard and couldn't help anybody," Flint said.

In addition, the third–year coach hopes that Clarke's absence from yesterday's game prevented even further injury to the foot, and may allow him to play again before the tournament ends.

"It's very tough to sit on the sideline and watch everything go down," Clarke said. "I'm usually out there directing. It might be a gametime decision tomorrow."

This new found poise that Zo is bringing to the floor is helping his defense as well. He is top in the league with 3.9 blocks a game. Averaging 3.9 blocks means that he is staying out of foul trouble. Had it not been for Mourning becoming a leader, the Heat would find themselves in the basement of the Atlantic Division. Instead, they find themselves in a fight for the top with bitter rivals the New York Knicks.

• The last of the Detroit "Bad Boys" has surfaced again. No, not Bill Laimbeer or John Salley. Yeah, it is the player that every fan loves to hate. He is none other than Dennis Rodman. The Worm is now playing with the Los Angeles Lakers. Rodman came just as coach Del Harris was being fired. Was Rodman the player that could have saved his job and bring the Lakers to the top of the Western Conference?

Interim coach Kurt Rambis has lost the goggles and now has to deal with the NBA's most disappointing team thus far. Only time will tell if Rodman will bring another championship to Los Angeles, but why not start with a ring for the other hand (he has five already, two with the Pistons and three with the Bulls)?

In the meantime try to swallow this. He came into the game on Sunday against the Rockets sporting yellow and purple hair. If that does not qualify him as a true Laker then what will? Like him or not, the guy wins.

He could get ejected from every game, but if he grabs 15 rebounds, five will probably offensive, which turn into points and keeps the opponent from capitalizing off second chance points. I would take him on my team if I was a general manager.

Versatile Sell proves to be a jack–of–all–trades

By Michael Kobylanski

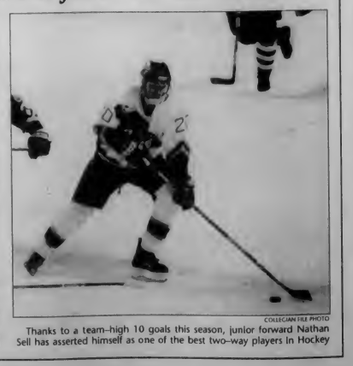
Entering the 1998–99 season, Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen knew that he had one of the top defensive forwards in Hockey East in junior center Nathan Sell.

Offensively, however, Mallen stated even before the season began that Sell was one of the players that he was hoping to get increased offensive production out of.

Well, ask and you shall receive...

The Pembroke, Ontario product has lived up to his coach's preseason aspirations this year, as he leads the Minutemen with 10 goals. Many of those 10 tallies, however, have come in clutch situations, as three are game–winners.



"Over the course of four years everyone improves with their point production," Mallen said. "The thing about Sellzy is that two of those goals came late in the game in the past couple of weekends. That's what we need from our upperclassmen."

The pair of goals which Mallen was alluding to came in the 6–3 win over Northeastern on Feb. 13, and the 3–1 win over Providence on Saturday night that clinched a berth in the Hockey East playoffs for the Minutemen.

"It [the success at scoring goals this season] is all about being in the right place at the right time," said a humble Sell. "Like the goal from this past weekend [against PC]. Fitzy [Ryan Fitzgerald] did all the work, and I was in the right spot in front. I guess you could say he made me look good."

Despite the fact the Sell is the team leader in goals and is third on the team with 14 points, he still seemed to be a little disappointed with his accomplishments.

"Coach wanted me to step up, and I don't think that I've stepped up to where I should be," Sell said. "It's hard to say. The team as a whole wasn't where we expected to be offensively, but

Poet Achebe returns for reading at UMass

Renowned author and former UMass professor Achebe reads yesterday.

In celebration of the 20th anniversary of the University of Massachusetts New WORLD Theater, internationally renowned writer Chinua Achebe presented a reading of his poetry to a packed house at Bowker Auditorium yesterday afternoon.

Achebe said that gathering to hear his poems read was just an excuse to sit together: "The Igbo people say that when people gather together under the moon, they come together because it is good for people to come together."

Director Emeritus of the UMass Fine Arts Center Frederick Tillis opened the presentation with a glowing introduction of Achebe.

Tillis explained that Achebe's visit to UMass was an especially important one because of his long association with the school. From 1972–1975, Achebe was a visiting professor for the UMass English department and the W.E.B. DuBois Afro–American Studies department.

After a few years' residence in Nigeria, he returned to UMass in 1987 as visiting fellow for the Afro–American department. Also, two of his children are graduates of UMass.

Onyinyechi Ihedigbo, a senior marketing major who works for the New WORLD Theater, welcomed Achebe on behalf of the students. Ihedigbo described Achebe as "one of the greatest African writers of our time."

She proceeded to passionately recite a passage from some of Achebe's writing and explained the importance of his work to her as a first–generation Igbo child growing up in Amherst.

"UMass is home–away–from–home for my family," remarked Achebe. He further explained what significance his time here at UMass held for him.

"At the end of the Bi–Afro Civil War in 1972, I was disgusted with my country [Nigeria]," he said. While at UMass, "I caught my breath again, and then I was able to return home and

Braden talks on segregation

Civil rights organizer encourages activism

By Carla Costa
Collegian Correspondent

Anne Braden, who has spent the past 50 years of her life working as a writer and organizer for several civil rights groups, used her own experience Wednesday to encourage listeners at Memorial Hall to get involved in the struggle against racism.

"Racism is so in–depth," she said. "The foundation of this society is built on racism. Once you deal with that, the rest of it falls like a deck of cards. Everything comes into question."

Braden was propelled into the civil rights movement in the early 1950s after she and her husband were charged with sedition against the state of Kentucky for selling their home, located in a "white" section of town, to an African–American couple. Her book The Wall Between details the case and its effects on those involved.

"Whites are privileged. You have to recognize that, learn it. Don't sit around feeling guilty," she said. "Understand racism and recognize that it is a structural problem. It's woven into our society."

Braden's experience as a young court reporter in Birmingham, Alabama was what incited her desire to make change. Although she had lived a "sheltered life," she chose to step out of that shell.

"What I saw made me cringe," said Braden. She decided to leave Birmingham for Louisville, Kentucky where she found groups who were organizing to make change.

"Once I realized those people in Alabama were wrong, it wasn't too far before I realized that those people in Washington were wrong," said Braden.

"I decided I wanted to work to change things. I went through a metamorphosis. I had to turn my values system upside down."

Benefitting because of others' suffering, she also noted, is dangerous.

It was hard for Braden to go against the racist beliefs of many of her loved ones. "It's a painful process to disagree with your family," Braden said. "But once you did it, you were free from a prison."

Despite the struggles with her family, Braden said she never felt alone. "We build up a sense of kinship among those who are committed to the same world."

The world Braden says she is committed to is "the Other America." She coined the term after an activist and mentor told her "you don't have to join the lynchers... Join the Other America. It's always been there. Whites as well as blacks. They were the people who fought against slavery and injustice."

In order to make change, Braden suggests grabbing hold of a specific problem, citing the struggle over the University's affirmative action plan as a local example. She encouraged students to fight for affirmative action despite the fact it is a mild remedy.

"If we get pushed back on this, we're going to get pushed back on other things... I admire you young people who came out today to fight against racism," Braden said. "Share that vision with others."

Braden said people of her generation who became active in the southern civil rights movement have their own vision to share with this country.

"What we went through as individuals to deal with this prison is what the whole country needs to do. It needs to turn itself inside out and upside down, and its policies and problems," Braden said.

"I think when the country does that, it will find, just as we found in our own individual experiences, that it's a painful, but not a destructive process. It opens up life in all directions."

Protesters organized, ready to go

Over 300 students crammed into the Student Union Colonial Lounge last night to discuss future plans to protest against the University of Massachusetts change in admissions policy. Because so many supporters showed up, the meeting had to be moved into the Cape Cod Lounge to allow for more space.

By the end of the meeting, students had unified and come up with a plan of action. They left chanting, "The students united will never be defeated."

At the beginning of the meeting Nelson Acosta, director of the ALANA Affairs Office, explained the "power structures" and who the "main players" were. Acosta stressed that Chancellor Scott cannot take the fall for this, and many of the decisions go way beyond the chancellor.

"Bulger's staff is all white and he does not have a good history dealing with people of color, so Scott was told to do it," said Acosta. He also mentioned the fact that Bulger was appointed by Governor Celluci. He encouraged students to take a stand by registering to vote, and bringing the issue to the attention of the media.

According to Acosta, Chancellor Scott could have set up an independent committee to look at the current admissions policies, and, rather than the abrupt change, moratorium could have been called. A moratorium is when a policy is not taken out of place, but is subject to review.

Resa Singleton, student coordinator of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), spoke next. She gave an overview of what has been going on. According to Singleton, the University lawyer has called the former practice of admis-

The Massachusetts Student Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) held a campaign in the Student Union yesterday to help stop air pollution in Massachusetts.

The group is sending a "video post card" to Governor Paul Cellucci, ensuring that he keeps his pledge to request higher emissions standards for the state's power plants.

Students walking by were approached by MassPIRG members and asked if they would like to be filmed making a statement to Cellucci, telling him to support legislation against air pollution.

"Governor Cellucci, you breathe the same air we do. Even if the five [worst polluting power plants] are giving you incentives, you need to look at the health of the people [in our state]," Bron Tamulis, a member of the Radical Student Union, said to the camera.

Along with the "video postcards," MassPIRG planned to send 1,000 petition signatures supporting their cause. They had already gathered 500 by yesterday afternoon.

Michelle Toering, energy advocate for MassPIRG, said that the air pollution in Massachusetts causes 1,000 pre– mature deaths yearly, as well as increasing respiratory and cardiovascular diseases. She said that 68 percent of the state's rivers and streams have fish advisories for women of child–bearing age and children, due to the mercury content in the fish.

"There is not just one source for air pollution; rather there are a few," Toering said. She said that coal and oil–burning power plants are responsible for 40 percent of the air pollution in the state.

"Of the 31 power plants in the state, the five worst are the ones that don't comply [with the standards]," Toering said. "These five are responsible for 80 percent of this air pollution."

She further said that as part of the Clean Air Act of 1977, these five plants don't have to comply with the act. Toering refers to this as the "Lethal loophole"

"The general idea was that these plants would be shut down by 1987," Toering said.

Lindsay Melnick, a junior BFA major, signs a petition during MassPIRG's Clean Air Action Day yesterday.

Jay Rasku, campus organizer of MassPIRG, said that as part of the Clean Air Act, there was an original agreement for plants not complying with the proper emissions standards to either shut down or comply within five years. This, however, has not been the case.

Frank Poirot, public relations person for Northeast Utilities, the company that runs the Mount Tom plant in Holyoke, says that the plants are currently meeting the standards required by law. He says that the idea of the Mount Tom plant meeting the new source emissions standards is "unfair and unreasonable for a plant built in the 1960s."

Poirot explained his point using an analogy of cars; the old cars on the road don't have to meet the new emissions standards of newer cars built today.

Toering said that Sithe Industries, the company that owns the Mystic plant in Charlestown, and Southern Company, which owns the Canal plant in Sandwich, have met with MassPIRG to discuss their requests for higher emissions standards. They said they

GEO marches on Whitmore; demands raises

By Laura Forster

Following the crowd–gathering protest against the University of Massachusetts admissions policy on Wednesday, the Graduate Employment Organization held a protest yesterday demanding their overdue pay raises.

A gathering of about 30 students met on the Student Union steps, where many of them had also begun protesting the day before.

GEO President Emily LaBarbera–Twarog spoke about the administration's failure to pay the graduate the pay raises they promised last March.

"This is unacceptable. They [the administration] claimed computation problems," LaBarbera–Twarog said.

Upset about the continued delay on their checks, Donna Krupp, GEO vice president, said, "We know it's a multi–step process but nonetheless it's clear there is no urgency.

"We find this disrespectful of our members who are key contributors to this University," she said.

Amid signs sarcastically stating, "Have kids? They don't need to eat, right?," speakers tried to draw a crowd despite the slow fall of snowflakes.

In addition to the appeal for their money, Frank Olbris, a representative of clerical workers for United Staff Association (USA), spoke about the bad effects of privatization on campus.

USA is a task force representing campus unions. Olbris explained how privatization can take away employee benefits such as state health insurance benefits, retention benefits, and vacation and sick leave. Olbris said privatization is an issue the Student Government Association is concerned about as well.

Kim Marcello, GEO chief negotiator, stated the organization's appeal more simply.

"All we're asking is to be treated as

Bar owners still fired up; dispute smolders over ban

Town Meeting collects signatures

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Tempers flared last night as fired–up bar owners attended the Board of Health meeting to hear the latest on the still smoldering smoking ban issue.

Director of Health Epi Bodhi gave the Board a report of smoking found in Amherst bars in February.

"These are not the only places the observer checked," Bodhi said. "They [observers] also routinely check places [such as] Charlie's and Mike's Billiards but they are not listed here. Also they tried to check Pruddy's, but it was not open."

The bar owners challenged the comprehensiveness of the report and expressed anger over other facets of the ban.

One bar owner said the report was selective enforcement and was illegal in Massachusetts.

"We are trying to enforce every place. What you are seeing is a piece of the report," Bodhi said. "I could have made it a [fuller] report."

But bar owners said smoke isn't in their bars, it's what their profits are going up in.

"This is an FYI for you guys. I have laid off six people. We tried to comply," said Harry Delano, owner of Delano's. "Business is 31 percent off, I'll put my books on the table anyday."

Members of the Board said from studies they had seen after other towns went smoke–free, the businesses ended up doing better.

The bar owners argued that this has not happened because nearby towns allow smoking so patrons go there instead.

"We're not promoting smoking. We're promoting businesses be at the same level," said Gerry Jolly, owner of Rafters and the Pub, after leaving the meeting.

However, Board members said after the owners left, that it wasn't necessarily the ban that caused a drop in profits.

"It doesn't surprise me drinking is down. The campus is threatening all holy hell for drinking," said Board member David Buchanan.

No matter what the reason for profit lons, the Board does want other areas to adopt a ban.

A meeting is planned April 9 that will include Boards of Health and Select Boards from surrounding towns to bring up the idea of having a smoking ban in their area.

Town Meeting will be getting involved with the issue too.

Meeting member Isaac Ben–Ezra told the Board last night that he is getting signatures for a warrant article that will go before Town Meeting and request State Senator Stan Rosenberg and State Representative Ellen Story to introduce legislation for the entire state to be smoke–free.

He said signing the petition for the warrant article would be a way for everyone discussing the issue to either "put up or shut up."

But legislation or not, Bodhi still means business when it comes to enforcement.

She said the individual who is currently an observer is going to become a spotter for smoking violations.

"We have plans for continued enforcement," Bodhi said. "I don't intend to step up enforcement. I intend to keep it at this level."

Bodhi said the spotter will be a health agent, undercover, who will be making observations, and the Health Department will base writing tickets on the observations.

Despite objections to an undercover spotter from Delano, Bodhi said being inconspicuous is essential.

"When a ticketer comes, everybody puts out their cigarettes for the five minutes when the ticketer is there," Bodhi said.

face my country."

Achebe enlightened the audience by reading six of his poems. The selections he chose to read included "We Laughed at Him," the sarcastic "Non-commitment," "A Refugee Mother and Child," and "Remembrance Day," a poem written immediately following the Bi-Afro war.

The final poem was read in both English and the Igbo language. Achebe explained that it was originally written in Igbo. It is entitled "Uno Onwu Okigbo," which literally means "house of death for Okigbo." Written for a great Igbo poet and friend, Christopher Okigbo, Achebe used the "dirge" form. A dirge is an action undertaken by the Igbo community when they hear that someone has had an untimely death.

Upon hearing the news of such a death, the members of the Igbo community won't accept it, he explained; rather they venture out looking for their lost friend. They believe that he/she must be playing hide and seek. This ritual is continued until the morning, and if the person has not been found, only then is his/her death accepted.

After reading the final version of "Uno Onwu Okigbo," Achebe said the English translation was not done by him, but by another Igbo friend.

Following Achebe's reading was a brief question–and– answer period. When asked how his world–famous novel, Things Fall Apart, was constructed, Achebe replied that "everyone helped me to write this book. My ancestors helped me by living their lives."

A woman from Puerto Rico remarked at the uncanny similarities of the rhythm of the Igbo language to the drum beats that can be heard in her small village in Puerto Rico.

The final question was about the intended audience for Things Fall Apart. Achebe answered that it was written for everyone.

She also said that MassPIRG and its coalition members had a petition of a proposed rule making new emissions standards for all plants sent to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). They have met with the EPA three times since then.

sions questionable.

"It's complicated— Chancellor Scott got word from Bulger's lawyers to make the change." Singleton went on to say that UMass has never admitted a student based solely on race. "This University is said to practice racial sensitivity, but we do not have a quota system because if we did we would have a 20 percent ALANA population here."

In the middle of Singleton's explanation, former UMass basketball player and present assistant director of Admissions Rigoberto Nunez silenced the room with his words.

He said, "I feel strong[ly] about what you guys are doing but I have a loyalty to my job. I'm not here to tell on admissions, but you scared the crap out of every person at admissions. You voiced your opinion, obeyed the laws and accomplished."

Singleton finished by urging the students to keep on top of the issue and said that this has been a problem since the University has been in existence.

Next, graduate student Kiya Stokes addressed the crowd. "This isn't emotional, it's scientific; there is power in numbers. If there are no students, there is no school. We need to continue to build."

Stokes then explained that a task force was set up to deal with the issue effectively. The task force is divided into three subdivisions: a group to deal with the media, a negotiating committee and an education–for–action committee.

The committee discussed three main ideas: how to centralize activities to get the word out, how to organize, and how to create a base.

Each committee is set up to deal with a different aspect of the changed admission policy. Many students at the meeting were stressing the educational part as essential for getting a clear and concise point across to the public.

Numerous events were also planned, starting Tuesday. Next Tuesday there will be a sit–in at Hampshire College at 7 p.m. where professors and Singleton have been invited to talk and educate the public. Also that night at Amherst College, Ward Connelly is speaking at 7 p.m. Connelly was an intricate part of the state higher education system when it did away with its affirmative action policies in California.

On Wednesday there will be a teach–in on the UMass campus in room 163 of the Campus Center at 7 p.m. On Thursday there will be another rally at 12 p.m. which will start on the steps of the Campus Center.

Besides the student organizers, teachers and faculty came to the meeting too. Sara Lennox, a professor of German and Social Thought and Political Economy (STPEC) said she and approximately 25 others are willing to be arrested in place of students if the need arises. Another teacher brought her class to the meeting and said that she and her class will be committed to the cause for the rest of the semester.

Advising center hosts open house

By Mary Grein

The Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center (UAASC) hosted an open house yesterday afternoon in celebration of student achievement. The informal event was meant to recognize the more than 500 first–year pre– major and undeclared students who received a 3.0 grade point average or higher last semester.

"Our goal for this open house was to thank the community for their support," said Pamela Marsh–Williams, associate dean and director. "We want to celebrate with the campus community our new location which is giving us an opportunity to show the range of services offered to our students in a central location; one that is well–equipped, professionally furnished and closely aligned with other academic and support units."

Although, as Kerry Gilfeather, a freshman pre–education major said, "It was nice of them to recognize us."

Many students at the open house were confused as to what they were meant to be doing during the event. Some were surprised at the individual attention that each student received; they were expecting there to be one speaker addressing advisement in general.

During the two–and–a–half–hour open house program, staff from groups such as pre–major advising services, learning support services, pre–law advising and the Honors Program Office of National Scholarship Advisement were available to answer any questions students had. The staff said they are very excited about their new location and are eager to make students aware of what they have to offer.

During the open house, tours were being given of the newly remodeled sixth floor of Goodell.

The staff said they understand that it can sometimes be difficult to make a decision about one's major and they want to make those decisions as easy as possible.

"The advisors were very helpful today in explaining where I needed to go and who I needed to talk to in order to declare a major," said Nicole Beads, an undeclared freshman.

The UAASC, a unit that was only developed two years ago, is looking towards making as many students as possible aware of the services they offer.

professionals," she said.

The GEO protesters made their way to the Human Resources Office in the Whitmore Administration Building to demand a timeline on their raises.

According to LaBarbera–Twarog, the offices in Whitmore were locked up, as they were on Wednesday. After about 15 minutes and a visit to the Treasurer's Office, the protestors said Human Resources employees told them the administration will try to meet their demands.

Goodell was also locked up, anticipating the protestors would stop there, as they did on Wednesday.

LaBarbera–Twarog wonders what happens to the interest on the pay raises which GEO asks for, which she estimates to be about half a million dollars.

GEO is working closely with a newly–forming task force of graduate and undergraduate students who are joining together to protest the admissions policy as well as the pay raises for graduate students.

Panel at AC talks about Clinton sex

By Kevin Donoghue
Collegian Correspondent

Shortly before Monica Lewinsky appeared on ABC's "20/20" Wednesday night, a panel of political science professors and a psychologist met at Amherst College to discuss the roots of President Bill Clinton's sexual behavior.

Nancy McWilliams, a psychologist at Rutgers University, suggested a clinical laundry list of reasons why President Clinton may have had an affair with Lewinsky, including expression of hostility towards his wife. McWilliams said Hillary Rodham Clinton's failure to secure a national health care plan may have pushed the president to the affair beginning in 1994.

"That was his big issue," McWilliams said. "National health care was where he hung much of his self–esteem. Secondly, I think he blamed his wife who had headed the project."

McWilliams, who has never met Clinton, said hostility towards a variety of things can often trigger questionable sexual behavior. That hostility, she said, is commonly directed at a lower, or in many cases, at places of stature — which according to McWilliams, may have led Lewinsky to her decision to become involved with the president.

Boredom and loneliness, McWilliams said, could have also influenced Clinton.

"I think he found himself extremely bored when Chelsea reached adolescence," McWilliams said. "Loneliness can really set in when your kids reach the point when they value their peers more than you."

Thomas Dumm, who teaches a course on the American presidency at Amherst College, places blame on Clinton's political ego. Dumm said Clinton has been a "preemptive" president, meaning that he has desperately needed to make first moves and establish himself as superior to the crowd even at the expense of being less than genuine.

"It may seem that the president has been pretending to be the president," Dumm said.

He said Clinton was told by his personal ex–advisor, Dick Morris, to make all those below him look "bumbling, small and incompetent."

The political science professor compared Clinton's presidency to other "preemptive" presidencies like those of Dwight Eisenhower and John F. Kennedy. The comparison to Kennedy elicited an interested response from the audience of the octagonal building.

"The president of the United States can get just about anyone he wants," said Suzanne Feigelson, a sophomore English major at Amherst College. "So, out of all the women in the world, why wouldn't he pick someone more like Marilyn Monroe?"

The panel responded with laughter and an ostensible joke.

"Clinton likes big hair and he likes big features," McWilliams said. "Have you ever seen a picture of his mother?"

All three panelists, the third being Amherst College political science professor William Taubman, agreed that Clinton's is a generational phenomenon not exclusive to him. They said Clinton merely reflects the mores of the sexual revolution and its era.

"I don't think it's impossible to believe that he really thought he did not have sexual relations with that woman," McWilliams said while referring to a "technical virginity" in which only intercourse constitutes sex.

"He seems to carry the values of the post–Woodstock hippie culture," said Dumm as Hadley Arkes, Dumm's department colleague, nodded his head vigorously in the audience.

Dumm said, however, that the "narcissism" which he feels may be responsible for Clinton's affair with Lewinsky is also very well–suited to the persona and responsibilities of the Oval Office.

Do you support the students who are protesting the new admissions policy?

"I think the protest is misguided. I am fully in favor of free speech but I think this needs to be a legal issue outside of campus."
Paul Ferro, Senior, Political Science

"Yes. I think this school needs an affirmative action policy to ensure continued diversity on this campus."
Allison Meehan, Senior, Communications

"I agree with protesting for free ice cream sundaes; everyone on campus would be happier, unless they are lactose intolerant."
Chris Coldwell, Junior, Communications

"Yes. The campus isn't as diverse as the administration said it is. We don't have 20 percent ALANA students. Is the administration saying there are enough minorities on this campus?"
Amit Vachher–Gnanathural, Sophomore, BDIC

"No doubt. I'm black and this directly affects my people. Doing away with affirmative action is absurd. Blacks have not caught up yet."
Damon Eden, Senior, Legal Studies

"I have slightly mixed feelings. Minorities have a disadvantage and they need something to compensate."
Rosa Bak, Senior, Art

"I think the University needs to come up with a policy that doesn't completely eliminate affirmative action, but tries to consider the needs of all low–income students."
Matt Pacheco, Junior, Political Science/ Economics

The examination conspiracy

It's 7:15 a.m., and the sun is finally reaching the windows of the basement lounge in Van Meter. I sit here with two friends, looking at our collection of books spread out across the table, interrupted only by the occasional overturned coffee cup or empty Marlboro pack. We sit here quietly, in that unmistakable silence which can only be the aftermath of a night of caffeine, nicotine and studying.

James Bachman

I slouch low in my chair now, contemplating what possessed me to study with the girl who can't stop talking, and the guy who didn't "really" have any work due tomorrow. My mind has been spinning for a half-hour now, but I feel my second (or maybe third) wind coming with the warming sunlight.

My exam is still almost three hours away, but I crush out my last cigarette with the realization that it will soon be time to leave my loyal companions for the confines of home (and a hot shower). After a quick bite to eat (or whatever my stomach will hold down), I'll be back on campus for the impending Spanish exam. Unshaven, bags under my eyes, and a big twitchy caffeine smile pasted across my face, it's infeasible to think I'll put forth anything less than my best effort this morning... oh, how I love exam weeks!

I know many of you out there can relate. Whether it's this week, next week, or sometime in the recent past, we all eventually run the gauntlet of quizzes, tests and term papers at some point every semester. My question is, who schedules these weeks? Who could be that cruel, conniving and diabolical? What kind of person can sleep at night, knowing that thousands of UMass students will be denied the same rest directly because of his or her actions? Who is loathed by the world so much that the only outlet for their frustrations is the ritual torment of fun-loving college students? Saddam Hussein? Pinochet? Newt Gingrich?

We may never have an answer, but we must keep searching as long as "the truth is out there."

I realize that some (or maybe all) of you probably think I'm a few fries short of a Happy Meal. But I don't resent your feelings. I too was once oblivious to the secret objectives of those behind this evil scheme. As a freshman, I believed it was possible to have a quiz, two exams and three papers, all due on a Wednesday, completely by pure coincidence.

I accepted that I dug the hole myself with procrastination, poor class attendance, and sheer laziness. But as the years have stretched on, I've come to realize there are no coincidences. People who attend every class waste gasoline, and there is a greater force than we know of behind examination scheduling.

I have never come forward before with this knowledge, out of fear of the repercussions I may bring upon myself. But after having a test and a paper rescheduled this week to bring my total to five such burdens in two days, I have come to suspect that the hierarchy in question has caught onto my probing. I come forward now, not to draw your sympathies, but to warn you of what you're up against, and to give solace to those who have been so victimized, only to return home and be labeled "lazy" by misunderstanding parents. We are not idle lay-abouts (with the exception of the gentlemen from #2 Brandywine), but repressed students who often face obstacles nearly impossible to overcome.

"If you normally study with the well–endowed "co–ed" from across the hall, tell her to bring a friend."

Now you may be wondering what you can do to help end such injustices. Well, the sad fact is nothing, nothing unless you want to risk being thrown into the same academic quagmire I've been slowly drudging my way through over the past few days. The best you can hope for is to win this battle on your report card. Remember, when your next exam week from hell comes, that "they" want you to quit. To just give up and be left at "their" mercy. You must never let that happen!

Whatever your study habits may be, increase them when you sense the challenge forming. If this means I'll be running into you at 4:30 a.m. tomorrow Tuesday morning, throwing down cups of coffee and rice pudding at the Whately diner, while you finish reading about the hypothetical adverse effect of cold fusion, then that next cup of java is on me. If you normally study with the well–endowed "co–ed" from across the hall, tell her to bring a friend. If your study sessions frequently begin with your roommate's Ritalin prescription... get help (or soft tissues).

It doesn't matter how you beat the exam trap, only that you triumph in the end. So keep the Folgers well–stocked, watch out for the professor who says due dates are to be announced later, and always be aware of your surroundings. "They" could come for you next.

Coming Attractions

I'm sure most of you are familiar with the film I Know What You Did Last Summer. No? Really? Well then, allow me to refresh your memory. I Know What You Did Last Summer featured a horribly–written script supported by the cleavage of two of today's sexiest young actresses, Jennifer Love Hewitt and Sarah Michelle Gellar. The movie featured more titillation than a televised interview with U.S. Secretary of State Madeline Albright — yes, 8,000 year old Madeline Albright. She's so hot. What? You don't think so? To each his own, goddammit. Regardless, now you remember the movie. What a rancid piece of filth. I definitely agree.

You must be curious why I mentioned I Still Know What You Did Last Summer. Masochism, perhaps? No. Be patient, I'll clue you in soon enough (Damn impatient college students). OK, here goes: I Know What You Did Last Summer was a horrible film, a blemish upon the movie industry. An absolute nightmare. If all it as I claim, then what must be said of I Still Know What You Did Last Summer, the sequel to the aforementioned movie disaster?

I am enrolled in the English Writing Program. I have been to Worcester Dining Hall. I work at the Bluewall. I know what hell is. I have seen Satan dancing over the threshold of hell. Let me tell you, the Lord of Darkness is a punk. He's no player; he's a hack wannabe. The man likes Twinkies. If the legions of hell were half as evil as the producers of I Still Know What You Did Last Summer, Marilyn Manson would be elected president, Amherst would be renamed Belchertown, and all of us would be forced to wear FUBU gear and drink Pepsi One all day long.

The important thing to realize here is that sequels are a bad idea. For example, bellbottoms? No. No bellbottoms. To quote Dennis Leary, "I wore them once, I didn't get laid, I ain't wearin' 'em again." Sequels are like bellbottoms. A new segregation is upon us, Amherst. A sequel, if you will, to the hatred of the past. Segregation, the sequel coming to an Amherst Admissions office this winter.

Come now, all of you must know about segregation. In fact, if you don't, then welcome to the old Southwest. For those of you who fail to recall the atrocities of that racist era, allow me to remind you: racism, prejudice, and apathy. Segregation was a time when America lay divided, split by a hatred that betrayed the notion of the inherent decency of mankind. Men and women of color knew not justice, they knew not fairness, and they knew not hope. All they knew was the darkness of isolation and hopelessness.

Governor Cellucci, President Bulger, Chancellor Scott and the trustees of the University, in conjunction with the Supreme Court, have allowed this new segregation to infiltrate our sacred university. A recent Supreme Court decision ruled that Boston Latin, a public school (grades 7-12) located in Boston, cannot accept applicants strictly on grounds of racial and/or ethnic background. Now, the administration here at Amherst has decided to conform to this precedent.

Bill Larkin

This is horrible. We are in essence bowing to the almighty dollar. Our admissions policy was at very least 'tolerable' to everyone here at the school. More recently, however, money and lawsuits have become the issue. Now, our affirmative action stances and policies have come under question? Every time I think of this avarice, I picture the literary character Silas Marner singing the song "Sell Out" by Reel Big Fish. Pretty weird, huh? Not as strange as a state-financed educational system that refuses to stick to its policies. The policies are there for good reasons. To violate them is nothing but cowardice. The absence of tenacity at this university frightens me... a lot.

Because of this political debauchery, men and women of minority status are no longer given a fair shake at this school. Minority numbers are already down, according to the Daily Collegian and other news sources, by as much as three percent. This is not right. Supporters of the University's decision claim that affirmative action policies such as the one previously adopted by admissions give minority applicants an unfair and undeserved advantage over allegedly more talented or "better" applicants.

This opinion is very narrow and dim-witted. Ratios must be maintained. Although I will be the first to admit having a ratio policy established does allow some undeserving applicants to slip through the cracks, such individuals are few and far between. For the most part, the school had been giving chances to those who would otherwise drown in their situation, to those who had been choked by the gangly racism inherent within the power structure of society.

How can you or I say that applicant A is smarter or more academically inclined than applicant B just because of some test score or GPA rating? What if applicant A had tutoring and private schooling his or her whole life, unhindered by financial demands? What if applicant B was forced to balance a public education with a full-time job? Who is the better student? Who is fit to make that decision? Certainly not you nor I. Without race ratios, we cannot do anything to offset the racism of the American power structure. Education is the first step. If we cut off the scholastic lifeline, success in life is an impossibility.

So, unless you want to see a real life I Still Know What You Did Last Summer holocaust, do not accept the cowardice of this administration. Rage against the machine, Amherst. Do not go quietly into that dark night. Although William "Biggie Smalls" Bulger and David "Puff Daddy" Scott seem to feel that it really is "All about the Benjamins," do not succumb to the vice of conformity, I beg of you all. Authority is not omniscient. Authority is money. Authority is power. You are a student and a voice. You have the chance.

Perhaps our esteemed president Mr. Bulger can purchase some courage with that titanic raise in his salary we all recently financed. And then our esteemed chancellor Mr. Scott can spend the rest of the surplus on some vision. They don't even have to wait for a sale, unless they shop at Abercrombie and Fitch. I do think that Mr. Bulger could do with some Woods Scent cologne, however.

I hear they have some humanity on sale at K–mart in the Hampshire Mall, between the ghetto potato chips and Citra 12-packs. Those two stooges had better get some (Not the Citra, the humanity; the Citra is for me). I'm serious. If not, then my hand will have been forced. I'll do it; I'll transfer to Amherst College. After all, would Emily Dickinson stand for this malarkey? Wait a minute... ah, never mind.

Wal–Mart or Bust

Since tuition rates are crashing down harder than a Valu–Jet 747 these days, I feel that I should put the money to good use. The incredible sum of (sit down for this) $25 will be all mine to spend next year. It is because of this that I hope Wal–Mart hits town soon. I say this because Wal–Mart is the only place on Earth that a person can purchase a quantity of goods with $25.

I am not a glamorous guy. I have zero, zippo, no fashion sense at all, so why not buy my new wardrobe at Wal–Mart? The Salvation Army is a pretty high–end boutique in my eyes, and their clothes have already been used. At Wal–Mart I can get brand spankin' new clothes for even less money. The other thing about Wal–Mart is the fact that they have "the greeter," or basically an old decrepit person who stands at the door and says hello as you walk in. In retrospect, that frightens me and it also scares the crap out of a lot of people who go in there. Maybe I should give my 25 bucks to the older person working the door... nah.

Brian Lohnes

After I slip by the first hurdle, I will make my way to the clothing section, and what a section it is. Wal–Mart is definitely the home of fake clothes. They also have the Adidas shoes with the extra stripe and the Calvin Klein shirts with an extra C for extra cool. After I grab a whole bunch of great deals on fakes, I still have 20 bucks burning a hole in my pocket. I would next head to the music department and get some killer deals on CDs. The Wal–Mart in my hometown has the best selection of music made by people you have never heard of. I would grab some Yanni and a Winger CD and head off to the food aisle.

The best part about getting food at Wal–Mart is the sheer volume of food you can get for the buck. Still having 15 bucks in my pocket, I would grab three 20–pound bags of pretzels. Life is good; thank you, UMass! I am down to my final 10 bucks now, so I will head off to the book section and buy anything with Fabio on the cover. I don't like Fabio but it seems his career has well... fizzled. I am sure that he is busy between "I can't believe it's not butter" ads but I think he needs a little help.

I can only imagine heading to the front of the store fanning myself with my 23 clams. All of a sudden I get cold feet. A bright flash occurs and everything becomes clear. My $23 must be spent elsewhere. While debating on who to send it to, visions of Sally Strothers and Jerry Lewis dance through my head. Suddenly, a gust of wind blows and a Collegian is lying at my feet. The pages turn and there in big beautiful bold print reads, "Sale on Beer!" The tears well up in my eyes and my twenty–three pesos will be put to good use.

I want to personally thank UMass for freeing up $23 per person. I just don't understand why we can give cash back and I still have to sit in auditoriums with broken desks, chairs, and really inaudible microphone systems. I guess it's just one of those things, but I need to get going, the sale won't last forever.

Can spiders bite? Every once in a while, I wake up with a little scratchy bump on my arm, and I swear it's the work of a spider. Now, people have doubted me, saying that spiders can't bite. Whatever. I just hope that the spider was at the very least radioactive. I wouldn't mind getting spider–sense.

While I'm not saying that I don't enjoy suggestions for the paper, for the most part, we don't get too many good ones. No, we can't interview the president. We're lucky when a secretary from Whitmore returns our calls. No, we can't challenge the administration's admissions policy on the front page. This isn't the New Republic.

Now, I don't complain too often (well, if you don't know me). But there are certain rules, journalistically. We're not Samantha from "Bewitched," and we can't grant everyone's wishes. To quote Mr. T: "Show some respect, foo'."

On Wednesday, protesters intercepted Chancellor Scott in his car on Infirmary Way. Supposedly he was quoted as saying "I waited for you, but you took too long."

Now this is all true — I can't even make this up. Snide comments like that are not going to solve the problem of the affirmative action debate, Davey.

What has been underreported is the fact that in his car, he was listening to Jay–Z's "Can I Get A...?" Come on people, he's all for diversity!

Jazzy Straight Ahead at CC

The jazzy soul of Straight Ahead performs at the Campus Center Auditorium for Something Every Friday tonight.

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Grammy–nominated jazz artists Straight Ahead will perform at the Campus Center Auditorium tonight as part of an International Women's Day (March 8) celebration. The free 8 p.m. concert is sponsored by Something Every Friday and the Everywomen's Center.

According to the group's press release, Straight Ahead's music ranges from mainstream jazz R&B ballads to Brazilian funk. In 1989 they were named a finalist in the "Sony Innovators" competition and went on to open for legendary soul singer Nina Simone at the Montreaux–Switzerland Jazz Festival.

The group recorded its first album in 1990 called "Look Straight Ahead," on the Atlantic jazz label and captured a spot in the Billboard Contemporary Jazz Chart's "Top 20." Following that, they produced "Body and Soul," and "Dance of the Forest Rain."

Along with national and international concert appearances, Straight Ahead has appeared on CNN's "Show Biz Today," BET's "Video UP" and "BET on Jazz" programs, PBS's "Backstage Pass," and a McDonald's commercial.

The members of Detroit, Michigan's Straight Ahead are Marion Hayden, bass; Eileen Orr, piano and synthesizers; Gavelynn McKinney, drums; Alihea Rene, flute and vocals; and Faatimah, lead vocals.

Ms. magazine said, "This all–women quintet of jazz instrumentalists creates original compositions and puts a fresh spin on some of the standards."

Even though the group revels in its world–wide popularity, bassist Marion Hayden, in a Detroit Magazine article said, "We really enjoy performing for hometown audiences. We get a lot of good vibes from them."

International Women's Day is an internationally recognized day that acknowledges the significance of the contributions of women world–wide.

On March 8, 1857, in one of the first organized actions by working women anywhere in the world, hundreds of women garment and textile workers went on strike in New York City protesting low wages, long working hours and inhumane working conditions. The event ended in violent struggles with police.

Sandy Mendel, director of the Everywoman's Center, said Straight Ahead seemed like the perfect fit for the concert.

"I saw them a number of years ago in Springfield and I was very impressed with their music and performance," she said.

"One of the goals of the Everywoman's Center is to promote the visibility of women in the arts. Straight Ahead is a great example of women in the arts."

Mary's First hits Pearl St.

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

The last time modern rockers Mary's First performed in the area, they played an incredible set, opening up at the William D. Mullins Center. This Saturday night they take the Western Massachusetts stage by storm to showcase their distinct form of power–pop at Pearl St. Nightclub in Northampton.

With their debut release due out later this spring, Mary's First has been raising quite a stir in Western Massachusetts.

The band's irresistible signature song, "I Know," has been a staple on the airwaves for nearly a year throughout Western Massachusetts. The band's large airplay allocation is very unusual, considering they have yet to release any material or be signed to a major record label.

Formed approximately two years ago, Mary's First is comprised of lead vocalist and guitarist Dana Hammett, lead guitarist and former Sighz member Tommy Pluta, bassist Patrick Fogarty, and Chris (Critter) Ryan on drums.

With their talent, excellent songwriting, and exhilarating performances, Mary's First are sure to be capturing much more than just a strong local following.

Doors open at 7:30 p.m. with openers Astrajet stepping on stage at 8:30 p.m. Tickets may be purchased in advance at For the Record in Amherst, B–Side Records in Northampton, the Northampton Box Office, or by calling 1–800–THE–TKTS.

Minority donors are sought for marrow transplants, data bank

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

In some cases, the cure to fatal diseases such as leukemia or aplastic anemia is walking down the street but never finds its way to the individuals who need it because of their race.

The cure is a bone marrow transplant, and for thousands of people— African-Americans, Pacific Islanders, Asians and Hispanics especially— the cure never comes. In order to receive a bone marrow transplant, a match has to be made between the patient's bone marrow type and a donor's, which is listed in the National Marrow Donor Program (NMDP) Registry, an international list of voluntary bone marrow donors and patients.

According to the American Red Cross, African-Americans, Native Americans, Asians and Hispanics make up less than 10 percent of the total number of volunteers in the Registry. This means that a patient from one of those groups has less than 10 percent of the Registry in which to find a bone marrow match.

Bone marrow characteristics are genetically determined, therefore making a match more likely if the patient and donor are of the same race.

In an effort to increase the number of volunteers in the Registry, particularly from minority groups, the Red Cross is planning to recruit bone marrow donors March 10 in the Student Union Ballroom from 10:30 a.m.–4:30 p.m.

Anyone between the ages of 18 and 60, who is in good health and does not exceed the maximum weight guidelines, is qualified to be a bone marrow donor.

"Ethnic minority groups may save lives by becoming donors," stated a Red Cross press release. "People from all backgrounds are welcome but ethnic minorities are especially needed."

According to the NMDP, the first step in joining the Registry is taking 2–5 tablespoons of blood from the volunteer.

The blood is then tested to determine its Human Leukocyte Antigen (HLA) type. The HLA type is then entered into a computer to be included in the list of donors that is checked internationally by patients needing transplants.

If a donor's HLA type might match a patient's, the local donor center will contact the donor to arrange additional testing. Further testing is done to more precisely determine the donor's HLA type and compatibility with a patient.

If the match is made, a counselor meets with the donor to discuss his or her options and the donation process. After counseling, the donor decides whether to go through with the donation or not. If he or she decides to donate, the volunteer goes to the hospital and, under anesthesia, marrow is taken from the back of the pelvic bone with a special needle and syringe. Donors typically stay overnight and recover fully in a few days to a week.

10 Myths About Affirmative Action Part 1

During the past few years, affirmative action has been debated more intensely than at any other time in its 30-year history. Many supporters view affirmative action as a milestone, many opponents see it as a millstone, and many others regard it as both or neither — as a necessary but imperfect remedy for an intractable social disease. My own view is that the case against affirmative action is weak, resting, as it does so heavily, on myth and misunderstanding. Here are some of the most popular myths about affirmative action, along with a brief commentary on each one.

Myth 1: The only way to create a color-blind society is to adopt color-blind policies. Although this assertion sounds intuitively plausible, the reality is that color-blind policies often put racial minorities at a disadvantage.

Dr. Scott Plous

For instance, all else being equal, color-blind seniority systems tend to protect white workers against job layoffs, because senior employees are usually white. Likewise, color-blind college admissions favor white students because of their earlier educational advantages. Unless pre-existing inequities are corrected or otherwise taken into account, color-blind policies do not correct injustice — they reinforce it.

Myth 2: Affirmative action has not succeeded in increasing female and minority representation. Several studies have documented important gains in racial and gender equality as a direct result of affirmative action. For example, according to a recent report from the from the U.S. Labor Department, affirmative action has helped 5 million minority members and, 6 million white and minority women move up in the workforce. Likewise, a study sponsored by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs showed that between 1974 and 1980, federal contractors (who were required to adopt affirmative action goals) added black and female officials and managers at twice the rate of noncontractors. There have also been a number of well-publicized cases in which large companies (e.g., AT&T, IBM, Sears Roebuck) increased minority employment as a result of adopting affirmative action policies.

Myth 3: Affirmative action may have been necessary 30 years ago, but the playing field is fairly level today. Despite the progress that has been made, the playing field is far from level. Women continue to earn 72 cents for every male dollar. Black people continue to have twice the unemployment rate of white people, half the median income, and half the proportion of those who attend four or more years of college. In fact, without affirmative action the percentage of black students on many campuses would drop below two percent. This would effectively choke off black access to higher education and severely restrict progress toward racial equality.

Myth 4: The public doesn't support affirmative action anymore. This myth is based largely on public opinion polls that offer an all-or-none choice between affirmative action as it currently exists and no affirmative action whatsoever. When intermediate choices are added, surveys show that most people want to maintain some form of affirmative action. For example, a recent Time/CNN poll found that 80 percent of the public felt "affirmative action programs for minorities and women should be continued at some level". For instance, when the same poll asked people whether they favor programs "requiring businesses to hire a specific number or quota of minorities and women," 63 percent opposed extreme forms of affirmative action that violate notions of procedural justice— they do not oppose affirmative action itself.

Myth 5: A large percentage of white workers will lose out if affirmative action is continued. Government statistics do not support this myth. According to the U.S. Commerce Department, there are fewer than two million unemployed black civilians and more than 100 million employed white civilians (U.S. Bureau of the Census, 1994). Thus, even if every unemployed black worker were to displace a white worker, less than two percent of whites would be affected. Furthermore, affirmative action pertains to only to job- qualified applicants, so the actual percentage of affected whites would be a fraction of one percent. The main sources of job loss among white workers have to do with factory relocations and labor contracting outside the United States, computerization and automation, and corporate downsizing.

Myth 6: If Jewish people and Asian Americans can rapidly advance economically, African-Americans should be able to do the same. This comparison ignores the unique history of discrimination against black people in America. As historian Roger Wilkins has pointed out, blacks have a 375-year history on this continent: 245 involving slavery, 100 involving legalized discrimination, and only 30 years involving anything else, Jews and Asians, on the other hand, have immigrated to North America — often as doctors, lawyers, professors, entrepreneurs, and so forth. Moreover, European Jews are able to function as part of the white majority. To expect blacks to show the same upward mobility as Jews and Asians it to deny the historical and social reality that black people face.

My Jungle Fever

A Look at an Interracial Relationship

I never thought that my life would be affected by race. My mother is Irish and my father is Jewish. People of color are a rarity in my hometown of Sharon, Mass. Sharon is a predominately Jewish upper-middle class Boston suburb. It is no Jewish, in fact, that I am actually the only Kristen in the entire town.

Sharon is a town that is very proud of its Jewish ethnicity. When I was growing up there, my friends were all Jews. By high school I began feeling trapped by my Jewishness. I searched out for others, anyone different. Most of my friends would not even look at anyone who was not a Jew. My discussions with my peers were very lonely for me because I believe in soulmates and ruling out whole racial and ethnic groups lessens a person's chance of finding his or her soulmate.

Kristen Cadoff

Fortunately, my family has always been more open-minded than the rest of my town. My parents, who have an inter-faith marriage, taught me to be accepting of everyone. They taught one lesson that I will never forget: that no one chooses to be different, to suffer discrimination and injustice, and that no one has a right to think that they are better than anyone else. This is great advice, but I never had the chance to use this advice since I never had any friends of color.

I was expecting my college experience to be a time of diversity and learning new cultures. Much to my dismay, it is still as lily-white as my life has always been. The few minorities that are present on campus all hang out in their respective cliques according to their ethnicity. The white students stay away because they are intimidated by minorities and their "strange" ways. I converse with a few African-American classmates but our contact never goes beyond the classroom. Never having any real, personal relationships with anyone of color has always made me feel incomplete as a person.

This all began to change on New Year's Eve of 1997. I met my soulmate and from that point on everything changed. While partying the night away at Lupo's Heartbreak Hotel night club in Providence, the man of my dreams introduced himself to me and it was pure magic. I did not see black or white. I only saw beauty. I had the time of my life. It did not occur to me that he was African- American until I was halfway home. I had no idea that my world would be forever altered.

When I told my parents about my New Year's Eve, they were shocked. I doubt they thought I would ever have the chance to use their wisdom, and I especially doubt they ever imagined a possibility of me having a person of color as a boyfriend. My parents sent me to an expensive college so I could meet a nice rich Jewish boy to eventually marry.

They warned me that if I got serious with a black man, there would be more problems than I could handle. Strangers would stare and snicker, police would harass us, and friends would talk behind my back. My parents said that this would be an irresponsible relationship and that they would never accept it. I had faith in my friends, society and my folks; I just knew they would come around and life would be perfect.

It isn't. My interracial relationship has lasted for over a year now and we are planning a future together. My parents still do not accept this fact, but they do love him. The rest of my family has met my boyfriend, too. They have been nothing but supportive. Yet, I still feel alone.

"I highly doubt that my friends would have the chutzpah to follow their hearts if it meant being in a interracial relationship."

My friends support my relationship. They are jealous that they have never shared the kind of bond with a boyfriend as I do with mine. Most of my friends have had crushes on a minority at one point or another, but never pursued it. They are very concerned about pleasing their parents and fitting in. I highly doubt that my friends would ever have the chutzpah to follow their hearts if it meant being in an interracial relationship. They are probably missing out on finding their soulmate.

I love my relationship. I have found my soulmate. He makes me happier than I ever thought was possible. I love him with everything I have. It is not easy for us, though. My eyes have been opened to the intolerances of Jewish and white America. Many of us only see people of color as different and do not relate to them as fellow human beings. We have also been guilty of letting ourselves be ignorant of the many cultures that are out there.

Now I do have the exposure to other peoples that I always longed for, but it seems to be mostly negative. There is animosity from black women whenever I am with my boyfriend. I receive dirty looks and rude comments. There is bitterness among black women because white women are "taking their men." That was not my plan, I just fell in love.

My boyfriend has had to deal with similar ordeals. Society is not happy we are together. His parents are none too thrilled about us. They keep it to themselves, but we know.

Our backgrounds sometimes clash, but we use these clashes as learning experiences. We now can fully embrace each other's cultures as if they are our own. We hope to get married when all of our school is done and plan on having many beautiful bi-racial children. They will be a bridge to both of our worlds.

The happiest life one can lead is with his or her soulmate. Every relationship has its cross to bear; if this is ours, I am happy to carry it with the one I love, the man who makes me a more complete American.

Kristen Cadoff is an Ithaca College student.

Lenny Holston

I know that most of you think any multiculturalistic subject deals with some obscure tribe in some far away land dancing naked to some strange music on second thought, that would be a drunk Southwest resident on a Friday night) but you would be wrong. This bi-weekly Multicultural Affairs page is for everyone and is about everything. This page is for the most militant brother in Boston, the most foreign exchange students, the butterest peanest Rican; anyone, even any of you white students who did not immediately turn to the crossword puzzle when you saw "Multicultural Affairs." As a matter of fact, James Van Der Beek is one of my writers (psych!).

"Now more than ever we need EVERY-ONE to come together and fix what is wrong with this University."

This is a tumultuous time on our little campus. Now more than ever, we need EVERYONE to come together and fix what is wrong with this University (Chancellor Scott and Billy Bulger being two of them). We have a lot in common— we all would rather eat our own stool than chow down at the D.C., we all want ESPN on our cable system, and we all think that the comeback of N.K.O.T.B.'s Joey McIntyre is the best thing since sliced bread (I am not alone on this one, am I?).

We are all the same when you get down to the nitty-gritty. That is what this page is all about. The Multicultural Affairs page is your forum to discuss anything of any cultural significance you want, anyone's culture.

Now that I have said my piece, it is only appropriate that I weigh in on UMass' biggest crisis in awhile, the ending of affirmative action here at UMass- Amherst. Notice that I added "Amherst" because this is the ONLY campus in the whole UMass system to do so. As a matter of fact, this is the only state college in the Commonwealth to do so. Preparing for that "flood of lawsuits" a little early, don't you think. Chancellor?

Not to worry, all of you who cannot stand seeing the Commonwealth's handful of minorities get ahead in life, you need look no further than UMass President Billy "I am not Whitey" Bulger. He has a long history of opposing equal opportunity for disadvantaged people of color. The president of the entire UMass system has been waiting for the right cue. Chancellor Scott gave him that cue and now it is only a matter of time before EVERY state college follows suit. The dominoes will fall down hard (seems like everything black will). Just think, you thought by living in Massachusetts you were in a bastion of progressive thinking and equal access. Those "racist" southern states still have affirmative action.

I am as conservative as the next guy. I am not preaching liberalism or asking for quotas— God, no. There are facts that need to be looked at, some honest truths that many of us are afraid to confront. Commonwealth school systems are funded according to property taxes. How can children of color born in a Roxbury or a Brockton compete with white children from amply-funded school systems like Andover or Sharon? The deck is already stacked against them culturally, but with the economic disadvantage to go with it, minorities cannot compete. Affirmative action is only a remedy for a larger injustice; not a cure, though.

But enough about me. Let's all stand together, no matter what we are, It can be like "Captain Planet" or something.

Gymnastics seniors compete for last time at Curry Hicks

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow at 1 p.m. the seven senior members of the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team will take to the home floor for the final time in the last home meet of the season when they host Yale, M.I.T. and Bridgeport at the Curry Hicks Cage.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Michelle LoPresti

The strong senior contingent of Amy Caputo, Betsy Colucci, Sara Kelly, Michelle LoPresti, Rokia Madore, Jennifer Pokrana and Anita Sanyal has aided the UMass squad as it clashed with some of the top gymnastics programs in the nation.

This weekend will mark the second time this year that the Minutewomen have battled with Yale. The last meet marked a crucial turning point in the team's season. Their score of 191.550 was the highest team score of the season. Since then the Maroon and White have posted higher scores in their two subsequent meets to help their efforts in NCAA qualification despite finishing behind No. 1 Alabama and N.C. State.

Hoping to continue her recent success is Sophomore Jodi Goldberg. Goldberg scored second in the all-around for UMass last weekend at Rhode Island. Sentors Anita Sanyal and Jennifer Pokrana also made key contributions on the uneven bars to lead the Minutewomen to a second place finish in a field of four teams.

Sophomore All-American Jill Fisher continues her comeback from injury and is now healthy on two events. Last week against URI, N.C. State and Vermont she placed third in the vault and tied for sixth on the beam with teammate Mandy Mosby.

Returning home will be a welcome change for Massachusetts, as the rest of their meets this season will be away from Amherst. This season the home floor has proved to be a challenging environment for UMass. In the first meet of the season, the Minutewomen narrowly defeated their conference foe by less than half a point.

The two subsequent meets have featured the upper echelon of women's gymnastics programs. No. 12 Michigan traveled to UMass on Jan. 24. In the following home meet, the Maroon and White played host to the No. 1 team in the nation, the University of Alabama.

Despite dropping these two meets, the Minutewomen have improved by leaps and bounds, reaching higher team scores and fixing the early season mistakes to become a solid team.

Tomorrow marks the last time the women's gymnastics team, and in particular the seniors, have a chance to show the home crowd just how far they have come this season.

Highly decorated U.S. gymnast Shannon Miller visits UMass

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

Shannon Miller, the most decorated American gymnast in history, will be broadcasting the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championship meet in the William D. Mullins Center on Friday, March 26.

Miller won three bronze medals and two silver medals in the 1992 Olympics and was a member of the gold medal- winning U.S. Olympic team in 1996. The graceful Oklahoma native also took the gold medal on the balance beam that year. She has been National Champion numerous times, and has been recognized as America's most famous Olympian.

Miller, and possibly former Olympians Jair Lynch and Blaine Wilson, will be broadcasting the meet, which will air on NESN. At this meet, the No.1 ranked Minutemen will take on Temple, Army, William and James Madison University. They will all battle for the title of ECAC champion. Temple has won this meet many times in the past, but with the crushing victory over the Owls last weekend, the Minutemen have little to fear.

In accordance with a new rule this season, the winner at the ECAC Championships will automatically qualify for a spot at NCAA Regionals, on April 10 in Champagne, Illinois. The top three finishing teams at Regionals go on to Nationals, so the blue ribbon at ECACs would supersede the somewhat uncharacteristic scores for UMass earlier In the season. Winning at ECACs would start UMass off with a clean slate where the gym team can show the rest of the nation who's boss.

Shannon Miller will be having an autograph session on the first day of the meet on Friday, March 26 at 7 p.m., and the final round of competition is the next day at 2 p.m. Shannon Miller being there will make the 1999 ECAC Championships a collegiate gymnastics meet to remember.

Gold medal–winning Olympian Shannon Miller will broadcast the ECAC men's gymnastics meet at the William D. Mullins Center this weekend.

though because they're going to have the last line change (being the home team). We're going to have to be smart with our changes," Mallen said.

What all this means is that, if the Minutemen were to win, they could end up as high as number six in the league, but with a loss they could drop as low as eight. The difference is playing the immovable objects known as Maine and New Hampshire, or finishing sixth and playing Boston College, which has only one good netminder in Scott Clemmensen.

"If they lose, they are probably going to panic because they play BC the next night. There's a lot at stake for them, but there's also a lot at stake for us. There's a lot of motivation for them to play their best game, but there is a lot of motivation for us to try and stay in sixth place," Mallen said.

The Minutemen will probably be guilty of a little scoreboard–watching on Friday night, when they listen for the scores of the UMass–Lowell / Northeastern game.

The Minutemen need to come up with the win to maintain sixth place and earn a return date for a series at Kelley Rink In Boston against the Eagles. The Merrimack game, for all intents and purposes, could be qualified as the first game of the playoffs for the Minutemen.

"Our guys have called six games must–wins and they've responded well in all of them. We've got to look at this like a playoff game and be smart about it. They've got two games to worry about this weekend, and we've only got one, so we're going to have all our focus on this game," Mallen said.

Men's tennis faces crucial tests

By James Piehl and Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Correspondents

UMass men's tennis is set for three tough matches this weekend in Maryland. George Washington and Bloomsburg. Last year the Minutemen faced the same three opponents but left a disappointing 0–3. This weekend they're hoping history won't repeat itself.

"My hopes are higher this weekend," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "We have a better team this year."

In their first match the Minutemen will be facing the Maryland Terrapins. The Terps are a mirror image of the UMass program, according to coach Dixon.

"If I had to pick one program in the nation most like ours I'd say it was Maryland in terms of depth, talent, non- scholarship program and all that," she said.

The match will set the tone for the weekend and with all three matches indoors, unlike last year, it will help the Minutemen play to their strength.

"Last year we struggled outdoors so having all three matches indoors will really help. This match can set up the weekend in a positive way," Dixon said.

For the Maryland match, Todd Chaney will take the No.1 position, sliding Steve Prisco to the No. 2 spot and keeping Rob Manchester at No. 3. According to Coach Dixon, if her team wins two of the top three matches, it will decide the outcome of the competition.

"It's going to be a tough match. It's going to come down to who wants it more," said coach Dixon.

A win against the Terps would propel the Minutemen into the big match with George Washington, which determines the seeding for the finals. If UMass beats the Colonials or the Temple Owls, later in the season, they will be the No. 3 seed in the tournament.

Unlike the Maryland match-up, the key victories lie in the bottom half of the order. GW has two seniors, which are the No.'s 1 and 2, and one other returning member from last year's club. The rest of the team are freshmen and Coach Dixon believes her squad can take an upper–hand in these matches.

"This match against GW is extremely important for the outcome of the season," Dixon said.

The third match–up of the weekend brings the Minutemen face–to–face with Bloomsburg. The Huskies are in the top five in the country for Division II tennis. Although a Division II opponent, the Minutemen are not overlooking the Bloomsburg Huskies.

"They are well coached, well trained and gutsy. The match should be even all the way down," said coach Dixon.

UMass plays Maryland today at 2 p.m., they rest up before battling George Washington tomorrow at 7 a.m. and finally playing Bloomsburg at 2 p.m.

UMass hoping for NIT selection

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

This weekend will serve as a prolonged waiting game for the Massachusetts women's basketball team.

Unlike last year, when the team gathered at Bertucci's in Amherst, it will not be watching the NCAA selection show, but rather waiting for a fax signifying an NIT berth.

After UMass fell to Xavier in the quarterfinals of last weekend's Atlantic 10 tournament their hopes for a second straight NCAA appearance were effectively dashed.

But with a 16–14 overall record, the Minutewomen are likely to receive consideration for the NIT, especially with two NCAA bids in the last three years.

Another key factor in favor of the Minutewomen is that they are likely to be the only team examined by the NIT commission from the A–10. That is, if the top four conference teams qualify for the NCAA tournament.

St. Joseph's receives an automatic bid after capturing the A–10 tournament on Monday night and after winning the A- 10 East regular season crown.

No. 11 Virginia Tech is a lock by virtue of their top 20 standing. Pencil in Xavier as well, as they post a 23–8 record and reached the finals of the A-10's before falling to the Hawks.

The one question mark for NCAA participation amongst the conference's elite is George Washington. The Colonials stand at 19–9 overall, and lost in the A–10 semifinals last Sunday.

However GW features two of the A-10's top players in Elisa Aguiar and Noelia Gomez. They were ranked in the Top 25 at several points this season, and played in last year's NCAA tournament, all factors playing in their favor.

If all four teams rightfully play in the NCAA, it would speak volumes for the A-10, never considered one of the premier hotbeds for women's basketball.

Therefore, the NIT would probably look to pluck the next best available squad for their brackets, and UMass would be the runaway favorite for such a slot.

The one negating issue in regards to the Minutewomen's chances is their lack of a true quality win during the 1998- 99 season.

Their strength of schedule was very high, which bodes in their favor, but they were unable to capture that one outstanding win over such opponents as then No. 6 Georgia, Boston College or Kansas.

The most impressive UMass victories of the year were home wins against Holy Cross and Maine.

However, for the most part UMass handled everybody they were supposed to, faring 11-0 against the lower-echelon of the A–10, and there is something to be said for that.

The NIT should not be considered a step backwards for UMass even though they qualified for the NCAA's last year. The rash of injuries and controversies surrounding the team could have buried the Minutewomen, so a post–season appearance of any sort should be considered an achievement worth noting.

At the very least, an extension of the season will certainly bring a smile to the faces of the three UMass seniors — Tez Kraft, Yolanda Rayside and Lucia Madajova — who would like nothing more than to throw on the Maroon and White one more time.

senior Aaron Braunstein, who posted a .322 mark last season to go along with three home runs in 1998.

The battle for the other two spots will be between Gavin Clark, junior Steve Asadoorian. Nick Gorneault, Scott Anderson and Mike Kulak.

Behind the plate for the Minutemen will be senior Brian Samela. The burly, hard–nosed backstop hit .303 last season for UMass and will be relied upon to take control of a young group of pitchers. Freshman Chris Morgan should provide quality backup to Samela.

The ace of the pitching staff will be senior co–captain and first team All–Atlantic 10 pick Bill Cooke. The southpaw was 8–2 last season with a 3.06 ERA and will now be the lone senior on the staff. Complementing Cooke as a weekend starter will be another lefty, junior Travis Veracka. The Stow product was 4–0 last season In weekday starts and weekend relief, but will now be looked upon to step up and give the Minutemen quality innings on the weekend.

Other hurlers who will be in the mix are sophomores Nick Skirkanich, David Loonie and Craig Szado, along with a host of newcomers that include Jesse Santos, Brian Blumsack, Brian Hourigan and David Williamson.

The Minutemen open their season today with a three–game series against North Carolina State, currently ranked No. 22 by the USA Today Baseball Weekly/ESPN poll. The Wolfpack boast an impressive 11–1 record.

"It's going to be a test," Stone said. "They hit for power... they are a good southern team."

Next weekend UMass flies further south to face South Florida and a potpourri of northern teams before getting its season underway at home at Earl Lorden Field on March 23. against Providence.

The Minutemen will also attempt to defend their Beanpot title at Fenway Park on April 27–28. Last year the final between UMass and Harvard, a NCAA Tournament South II Regional finisher, was rained out.

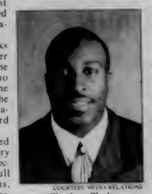
March madness: Minutemen's season ends at Atlantic 10's

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — Mother Nature provided March, and the Massachusetts men's basketball team brought all of the madness.

The only problem was that most of it came in the second half of yesterday's 72–68 loss at the hands of Xavier at the Spectrum in Philadelphia. Although the outcome of this game may have been decided long before it began, with senior Charlton Clarke absent from the line-up, the Minutemen managed to play an inspired game.

"You have got to go out and play," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said. "I think we pretty much knew he wasn't going to play since last night. I told [Rafael Cruz] and [Jonathan DePina] to go out there and play."



BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN
Lari Ketner poured in 10 points and grabbed 15 rebounds in a losing effort to the Musketeers of Xavier.

Musketeer forward James Posey all but sealed the game with two clutch free throws with 13.7 seconds remaining to give Xavier a four-point lead.

Following a Xavier time-out, UMass junior forward Chris Kirkland missed a ten-foot leaning shot. Posey grabbed the rebound and was subsequently fouled just before time expired on the UMass season.

The defeat marks the end of a roller coaster ride for the Minutemen, who were ousted in the quarterfinals of the Atlantic 10 tournament for the third straight season.

UMass mounted an extraordinary comeback in the second half to pull within two points, 70–68 with 20 seconds remaining.

The Minutemen had trailed by as many 16 points, 52–36, before their surge.

Part of the reason for the UMass run was junior guard Monty Mack, who erupted in the second half after only three points of production in the first frame.

The South Boston native finished with 18 points and six rebounds.

"I thought in the second half the guys settled down and made some plays," Flint said. "We got back in the game... [because] we only had four turnovers in the second half."

Hoping to pick up the scoring slack for the injured Clarke, Kirkland finished with 22 points, culminating a spectacular season which actually began with him on the bench.

"I wanted to try to be aggressive," Kirkland said. "I thought I had to pick it up a little bit with Clarke not playing."

A variety of costly turnovers hampered the Minutemen, but ultimately it was their inability to contain Musketeer guard Lenny Brown that led to their downfall.

The senior guard scored 19 of his game-high 31 points in the first half, helping his team advance to today's semifinal against Temple.

The Owls defeated Virginia Tech 64–51 in the first game of the afternoon.

"He had a great game," Flint said of Brown. "He had about 20 at the half. I thought we did a better job on him in the second half, [but] he hit big shots for them."

With his team trailing by four points with only one minute remaining, Mack grabbed a rebound off his own miss, and put back another shot. After the ball bounced off the rim four times, it became wedged between the basket and the backboard.

The resulting call was a jump ball with possession favoring Xavier.

"I said to myself right there, it's just the type of season it [has] been," Flint said. "We've just been wedged between the basket."

UMass senior Lari Ketner (11 points and 15 rebounds) played his final collegiate game but is looking forward to his upcoming NBA workout with the Phoenix Suns. His draft status remains uncertain at this point.

UMass misses Clarke

By Seth Koenig

PHILADELPHIA — Massachusetts senior point guard Charlton Clarke does not offer coach Bruiser Flint a lot on the scoreboard, averaging less than 10 points a game, and he does not overwhelm opponents with his 3.7 assists and 3 rebounds per contest. But against Xavier in the second round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament, it became crystal clear what he does offer... control.

Flint, knowing he would be without Clarke because of the guard's ailing foot, decided it would be best to use a game plan that was familiar to his team, and was effective enough to defeat Xavier, 78–77 roughly two weeks ago.

"We pretty much did the same thing [that we are accustomed to]," Flint said. "We stayed with what we usually do. That was it. That was it right there. We did a good job with what we wanted to do, but we turned the ball over a little too much in the first half."

The UMass coach kept his defensive alignment so that his two best man-to-man defenders, Monty Mack and Mike Babul, would guard Xavier's two quickest offensive threats, Garry Lumkin and Lenny Brown. This assured that Clarke's young replacements, Rafael Cruz and Jonathan Depina, would not be forced to keep the Musketeers scoring in check.

As a result, only one Musketeer topped five points in the first half.

Flint also instructed his squad to be aggressive offensively, not only to get the ball in to scoring range through Xavier's ferocious full-court press, but also because pushing the Musketeers over the limit on fouls would force them to resort to a half-court defense — which is UMass' preferred style of play.

Xavier picked up its seventh team foul with 9:10 still to go in the first half.

Strategically, Flint had this game pretty well figured out. However, he didn't have Clarke to keep the team under control.

Having held at one time a 10–9 advantage, the Minutemen let Xavier slide ahead 15–10. The frustration of matching up with the talented Musketeers quickly took UMass over, and center Lari Ketner was called for a technical foul for spiking the basketball in protest of a traveling call by the officials.

"Coach [Skip Prosser] talks a lot about him because he is a great leader for that team," Brown said. "It's hard to go out and play without your starting point guard."

Normally consistent players became unreliable without Clarke to help weather the storm. Second team all-conference guard Monty Mack was scoreless until 46 seconds were left before half time.

Both Ketner and Babul picked up their third fouls within the opening period, seriously undermining Flint's defensive strategy.

Still, when the remaining Minutemen collected themselves and put together a run, cutting the once enormous 16 point deficit to only two, 70–68 with 17 seconds left in the game, and victory was still possible.

Without Clarke there was no one without the ice in his veins to bury that final three-pointer as the buzzer sounded. Xavier escaped with a 72–68 win, and UMass returned to Amherst.

UM looks to improve on 3–0

The No. 7 Massachusetts women's water polo team heads to Princeton, N.J. this weekend, where it will take part in the Princeton Invitational. The invitational starts tomorrow, and ends on Sunday. The host team, No. 14 Princeton University, has been less than successful against UMass. Last year the Minutewomen were a perfect 6–0 against the Tigers.

The Minutewomen are off to a perfect start with a record of 3–0; in these three wins two of the teams have been ranked (No. 12 Michigan and No. 17 Villanova). UMass is the defending Eastern Champ and has looked sharp in the beginning of this season.

The team is on a hot streak and so are several players— in only three games 11 members of the team have scored goals. This onslaught of scoring has been lead by junior Marci Hupp, who already collected eight goals this season, six of them coming against Villanova. Last year Hupp was third on the team with 59 goals.

Junior co-captains Katie Grogan and Claudia Clement also had big-scoring weekends. Grogan racked up five goals, three of them coming against a tough Villanova team. Clement had four goals spread out over the three games.

Yet again, freshmen are making an impact in women's water sports. Swimming sensation Anne Dettloff showed her skill by scoring three goals this past weekend. Another freshman phenom Megan Perry lead the way for the freshmen with four goals. The last of the trio is Megan Thompson, who scored three goals against Salem-Teikyo.

One freshman that can not be over-looked is Dana Sinkwich. Sinkwich made the first start of her collegiate career; she tallied 20 total saves over the weekend, including seven against Michigan, six versus Salem-Teikyo, and another seven saves against Villanova.

In only his second season as coach, Dan McOsker has put together a powerful team. During his short tenure at UMass his teams have compiled a 33–6 mark, good for .846 winning percentage. McOsker was named the Collegiate Women's Water Polo Association Eastern Coach of the Year last year.

Team pairings and game times have not been set for this weekend's event.

Men's lacrosse hope to build off early win

The first legitimate test of the young season will come tomorrow for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, as the Minutemen travel to Ithaca, NY to face Cornell at Schoellkopf Field at 2 p.m. (WMUA 91.1 FM).

"This game will tell us a lot more about where our team stands," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said. "Playing Cornell is a big step up from some of the teams we have played early on in past years."

Last year, for instance, UMass opened up against Holy Cross as they did this year, but then faced perennially inferior teams in Fairfield and Hartford before facing the meat of their schedule.

Playing a high-caliber team like the Big Red early on could be dangerous for a young group such as this year's Minutemen, but Cannella feels it is to his squad's advantage to face the best right off the bat.

"It can only benefit us to play teams that have been traditionally considered a notch above us," Cannella said. "This team needs experience in big games, and they will get a chance right away this season."

The Minutemen opened up their campaign by pulverizing Holy Cross 19–4 at Garber Field on Tuesday, but a win over the Crusaders has almost come to be expected.

The Minutemen now hold a 14–3–1 all-time series advantage over their Bay State foes from Worcester.

Cornell, who was ranked No. 21 in the pre-season by Face-Off College Lacrosse Yearbook, is more of an unknown quantity to Cannella.

"We have never faced them as long as I have been here," Cannella said. "But I do know they would love to get a victory against us, because that would put them in serious contention for a top 15 ranking."

The last UMass–Cornell battle took place on opening day in 1991, with Cornell frolicking to a 16–7 win at Schoellkopf.

The Big Red have a storied lax tradition, but the program has struggled in recent years, including last season when they were 6–7 under second-year coach Dave Pietramala.

The Cornell attack features two seniors with serious firepower in Jon Morgan and Michael Voris.

Morgan tallied 15 goals and eight assists last season, while Voris provided 12 goals and 11 assists.

Senior Pat Dutton was superb at midfield, notching 22 goals to go along with seven assists.

On the UMass side of the field, sophomore attacker John Madigan established himself as a scoring threat, recording three goals on Tuesday, as did Rich Kunkel and Jeremy Guski.

The goaltending situation remains in question for Cannella, but he expects to call upon sophomore keeper Chris Campolettano for the second consecutive game on Saturday.

Campolettano was impressive in the season opener, saving 11 shots while allowing two goals.

"This is a game we have to get," Cannella said. "It will be a different environment playing in a 25,000 seat stadium. A lot of them are not used to that yet, so it will be interesting to see how they respond."

Despite the loss of two All-Americans and three starting pitchers from last year's Atlantic 10 Eastern Division champions, the Massachusetts baseball team is hoping that a mix of old and new faces will help to bring a sixth consecutive A-10 regular season crown back to Amherst.

"Based on last year, we lost some pretty good players. We have some pretty good sized-holes to fill," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "But we also have some talented players coming back. The kids have great attitudes, but they are untested, so it will be interesting to see what happens."

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN
UMass coach Bob Stone begins his 12th season with UMass. He hopes that his young team will be able to maintain the standard of excellence at UMass.

The Minutemen lost the heart of their order from last year's 27–12 squad in All-Americans Muchie Dagliere and Doug Clark, along with team MVP Pete Gautreau. Tack on the loss of Scott Burnsby, Ryan Cameron and Jeff Puleri from the starting rotation, and it might seem that UMass would have a rebuilding year ahead of them.

That shouldn't be the case for the Minutemen, however. Five positional starters are back along with two hurlers, and should provide veteran leadership for a team with 10 true freshmen and three red-shirts.

Offensively, junior Shaun Skeffington will once again be the catalyst for the Minutemen. The Fall River native hit over .300 last season in the leadoff spot, and will now make the transition from the designated-hitter role to the everyday starter at second base.

Who will play next to Skeffington at first base is yet to be determined. Sophomore Nate Lang started 11 games at that spot for UMass last year, and may be the frontrunner. Junior Keith O'Connell and sophomore Gavin Clark will also battle for playing time. Clark, though, is also a candidate for a starting job in the outfield.

The left side of the infield will be patrolled by a pair of seniors. Co-captain Seth Kaplan will play shortstop, while Bryan Mazzaferro will get the nod at the hot corner. Both players have legitimate offensive capabilities.

Two of the three outfield positions will be filled by new faces this season, thanks to the departure of Gautreau and Doug Clark. The lone returnee is

UM faces Warriors in finale

The Massachusetts hockey (11–19–2) team will close out their season tonight with an all-important battle with Hockey East rival, Merrimack. This game carries serious playoff- and tournament-positioning implications with it. They are scheduled to drop the puck at 7 p.m. at Volpe Complex, in North Andover.

Despite already having clinched a spot in the Hockey East tournament with a 3–1 win over Providence last Saturday at the William D. Mullins Center, the Minutemen still have a lot to play for. UMass currently sits tied with Lowell for sixth place in the league; they are one point up on their opponent tonight, Merrimack, and they are four points up on Northeastern.

The Minutemen have won the first two meetings between these two Hockey East foes. They were victorious in a 3–2 decision in late October and a 3–1 final one month ago. Both games were played at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen will now have to go on the road to beat Merrimack, something they haven't been able to do much of (winning on the road in Hockey East, 1–9–1) this season.

"To beat a team three times in a season is a very tough thing to do in our league. Merrimack is going to be fired up. It's their senior night and they also have their backs against the wall as far as holding onto a playoff spot," UMass coach Joe Mallen said.

Another obstacle for UMass will be the size of the rink at Volpe. Merrimack's home ice is small in comparison to many of the Hockey East rinks. But the Minutemen have played a variety of games on the small rinks. Their experience on small rinks includes games at Vermont and Providence, twice, but the Minutemen are 0–3 in games on small rinks.

"We decided not to practice up in Greenfield. We thought that the smaller rink down in Providence didn't really have an effect on us, so we're banking on that this time around. It's not like we haven't played in smaller rinks in the past six months," Mallen said.

In order for the Minutemen to be successful, they will need to stop Rejean Stringer and Kris Porter. Stringer has been productive all season, and is a likely candidate for some post-season accolades. Mallen named some specific players who have had success in slowing down the dynamic duo for the Warriors.

"A couple of guys, like Jeff Turner and Nathan Sell, have done a good job against them. It's going to be a little more difficult this time

Admissions addressed Scott speaks on WMUA

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David K. Scott spoke yesterday on WMUA about the new admissions policy that is causing tension at the University of Massachusetts.

He said he hopes UMass "emerges stronger, better, brighter and more unified as an institution," after all is said and done. Scott also explained why things are changing, but stressed that things are not expected to be that different.

Scott referred to the Bacci v. California case in which a white student sued for not being admitted to the University of California based on race.

"It is very important to remember what Justice Powell's decision was in the Bacci case. Race is one factor among many. Colleges and universities used to consider it as the major factor and that's what's changing," Scott said.

Race, according to Scott continues to be a factor in admissions.

"We have not dropped affirmative action, we have just moved from a super aggressive approach to one that still takes race into account," Scott said.

Scott had mixed feelings about enrollment at UMass for the upcoming years but said that applications are up. According to Scott, the University received 20,000 applications as compared to years prior when 18,000 was the norm. He said the amount of applications that come in from students of color has increased. But, he said, even though applications among student of color have increased it doesn't mean more students of color are going to come here. Scott said the University needs to retain the students of color that have been recruited and get them to come to UMass. Part of the reason Scott attributes students going elsewhere is "other institutions offer more financial aid and scholarship support than UMass does."

Scott also touched briefly on ongoing problems with SAT's and an admission policy where race is considered.

"There is a strong correlation between SAT's and family income. For every $10,000 SAT scores are 33 points higher. Any system that uses SAT's are going to discriminate against low-income people and that isn't fair. It is not surprising that low-income translates into SAT's. The University needs to take the steps to make sure that access is not denied to low-income families. Larger percents of low- income families are of color. If you reach out to low-income you will reach out to families of color."

OIT claims no control over Internet

Students able to access illegal web sites without OIT's knowledge

Thousands of University of Massachusetts students use the campus Office of Information Technology's (OIT) Internet server to download all sorts of academic information: the complete works of Shakespeare, on-line encyclopedias, breaking headlines. Using the on-line WISE system, students can even find out their grades ahead of schedule.

There are others, however, who might use the server for less than academic purposes — such as downloading newsgroups that promote child pornography.

Dan Blanchard, the director of Network Systems and Services at UMass OIT wants students to know that just because information can be downloaded, doesn't mean it's legal.

Jake Lilien

"Just as a post office or phone company is not responsible for the information that traverses through them, we are not responsible for the content of the information traversing through our server," he said.

OIT recently distributed a flier entitled, "An Important Note From OIT." The flier warned students of the dangers of certain illegal on-line activities, such as disrupting network services, distributing copyrighted material, entering a remote computer without permission, and possessing or distributing child pornography.

"If anyone here, either on campus or not, violates a law, our role is to put those people together with the appropriate investigative authority and provide any and all information concerning the alleged incident," Blanchard said. "That's our role."

In the Feb.10 issue of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, a letter to the editor written by UMass student, Brian Fealy accused OIT of downloading child pornography onto their server.

"Is OIT not violating its own policy, as well as the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by downloading this stuff to University-owned computers?" Fealy wrote.

Scott Comi, OIT's network operations manager, refuted Fealy's charges, insisting that OIT is not legally responsible for censoring downloaded materials.

Mt. Holyoke hosts feminist authors; Steinem among others

By Julie Fistikow
Collegian Staff

Gloria Steinem is one of four feminists coming to speak at Mount Holyoke College tonight on International Women's Day at 7:30 p.m., as part of Women's History Month.

The panelists are four of the five co-editors of The Reader's Companion to U.S. Women's History, the first major volume to examine the history of American women in a multicultural voice.

Gwendolyn Mink, Maryxa Navarro, Barbara Smith, and Gloria Steinem will discuss "Does Feminism Have a Future with the Next Generation?" and other questions on the collective feminist conscious in Chapin Auditorium.

The women have diverse backgrounds, bringing a variety of perspectives on feminism.

Mink, a welfare activist, is a professor of politics at the University of California at Santa Cruz.

Maryxa Navarro, professor of history at Dartmouth College, helped found both the Women's Studies and Latin America Studies program at Dartmouth.

A 1969 graduate of Mount Holyoke College, feminist activist Barbara Smith is the author of The Truth That Never Hurts: Writings on Race, Gender and Freedom.

Perhaps the most widely recognizable feminist name, Gloria Steinem, was inducted into the National Women's Hall of Fame in 1993. She is currently a consulting editor for Ms. Magazine, which she co-founded in 1972.

The Reader's Companion to U.S. Women's History was published to coincide with the 150th anniversary of the first Women's Rights Convention in Seneca Falls and addresses the lives and struggles of less visible women as part of the foundation of U.S. women's history.

According to a press release from Mount Holyoke College: "The Companion invites readers to ask 'which women?' whenever women are referred to, and, in doing so, the landmark volume gives all women, not just middle class white women—so often the feminist subject— equal place on the stage of history."

The volume also proposes to let women who make history, recall their own accomplishments. The co-editors were invited by Steinem to join her in the volume and each of the four, which also includes Wilma Mankiller, brought their perspectives as women of color to the project.

Mink, Navarro, Smith, and Steinem will talk about the historic traditions of race and class conflict in the feminist movement.

The event is free and open to the public. Seating will be available on a first-come, first-served basis.

Experts address racial inequality

By Christie Vincent
Collegian Staff

Russell Williams, economic and public policy researcher at the William Monroe Trotter Institute at the University of Massachusetts–Boston held a workshop on Race and Inequality as a part of a conference titled "Toward a Fair Economy: Closing the Growing Economic Divide" at Smith College this weekend.

Williams, who is also a member of the Center for Popular Economics, spoke on racial inequality from an economic point of view. He said that there is a myth in American society that after the de-segregation in the 60s and 70s, racism no longer exists today. This is why, he said, some people believe that economic inequality and racism are not a problem.

However, the solution to this "is not to disagree, but to explore what we can do in order to achieve a racially fair economy," he said.

Williams talked about the different ways of measuring inequality which are income, wealth, political influence, education, residential choices, health indicators, and access to accurate information.

Williams discussed some statistics on white and blacks gathered for the state of Massachusetts. In 1960, the median family income for a black family earned 69 cents for every dollar a white family earned. In 1990, the rate was 62 cents. And though the poverty rate for blacks went down from 3.93 in 1970 to 3.29 in 1990, he is not completely encouraged.

"It is a little improvement, but not as much as we think," Williams said.

The unemployment rate for blacks has gone from 1.9 percent in 1960 to 2.06 percent in 1990, he said.

Williams said that the wealth statistics he discussed are a national set. The median net worth average for white families in 1993 was $43,470, and $4,418 for blacks. He also said that the net financial assets for whites was $6,999.

"I won't let you guess how much for blacks," Williams said as he wrote a "0" on the board.

However, the level of education among blacks went up from .78 in 1960 to .86 in 1990.

Economist discusses crisis; world economic problems

By Clementine Bonner
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — Thanks to the New York Times, Jeffrey D. Sachs is known to many as "probably the most important economist in the world." His influence and prominence were not lost on the students and faculty of Smith College, who came in droves, filling Wright Auditorium March 5, to hear Sachs deliver an address on the recent worldwide economic crisis.

Sachs, director of the Harvard Institute for International Development, as well as a professor of economics at the University of Massachusetts, has served as an economic advisor to countries all over the world, as well as a consultant to the International Monetary Fund (IMF). An expert on international economics and macroeconomic theory, he set out to address the questions, "What's going on in the world? Why are so many countries suffering from severe economic crisis? And what, if anything, can be done about it?"

The celebrated economist began with a brief history of recent economic events in the world's emerging markets. The general phenomenon worldwide, he explained, has been the collapse of developing nations, which were credit worthy and economically promising enough to be able to tap into bigger and stronger international markets. The contemporary crisis in East Asia, he said, was not anticipated or predicted by anybody, and it quickly spread to almost all developing countries, stirring up devastation and panic in its wake.

Sachs believes every 10 years or so, a country which has borrowed internationally defaults on its loans, creating a chain of economic crisis the world over. He stated that this pattern began in 1825, when South American countries like Peru and Argentina defaulted on their debts from British bondholders. The most recent string of emergencies began in 1994 in Mexico, and has continued on since then, affecting Argentina, Thailand, Indonesia, Korea, Russia, and now Brazil and other sectors of South America, he explained.

Sachs addressed a self-posed question, "Why do emerging financial markets work in an unstable way?" He defined the 1990s by its focus on globalization and international trade, which, he said, has given confidence to investors to put money into countries that hadn't been perfect in the past about paying off their debts.

Focusing on the East Asian crisis that began in Thailand in July 1997, Sachs elaborated on a few of the theories that try to explain the financial collapse.

The key for emerging nations, Sachs ended by saying, is to allow the value of currency to fluctuate, and to carefully limit short-term capital inflows and debts. When things seem bad, "Try not to have anybody panic," he said, "and don't call the IMF!"

Students study Dickinson Class goes to homestead

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

The community based learning program at Mount Holyoke College is allowing for more thinking outside the box and drawing outside the lines, taking students out of the classroom so that students can take more from their learning.

Through courses such as professor Martha Ackmann's "Emily Dickinson in her Times," students are learning on the spot—literally. Ackmann's fall semester class gathered weekly at the Dickinson Homestead on Main Street in Amherst, where poet Dickinson lived for most of her life, to learn about Dickinson's poetry in context.

"We were focusing on both the life and the work of Emily Dickinson," Mount Holyoke senior women's studies major Siobahn Eaton said. "Sitting in her house at the place where she wrote really helped me understand her poetry better."

In return for the use of the Homestead's resources in enhancing the study of Dickinson's poetry, Ackmann's students gave something back to the Homestead and the Amherst community. Alongside classes about poetry were opportunities to learn about exhibition research and design from Homestead Curator Cindy Dickinson. From their work with Dickinson, the students developed an exhibition on the influence of Emily Dickinson's education on her life and poetry which is now on display at the Homestead.

Eaton said that although Ackmann chose the theme of education for the exhibition, the students "decided what we wanted to focus on."

The exhibit concerns both Dickinson's formal schooling along with what Eaton referred to as her "domestic education," and centers on "four major players" in Dickinson's educational life.

Emily Norcross Dickinson, Dickinson's mother, Mary Lyon, the founder of the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary where Dickinson received some of her formal education, Helen Hunt Jackson, a writer and friend of Dickinson and Margaret Maher, a domestic worker employed at Dickinson's home, make up the focus of the exhibit.

"We had to think carefully about what each one of these women contributed," Eaton said, in order to choose objects for the displays which were both representative and interesting to view.

Students also created materials to be used in the guided tours.

Eaton said she gained personally from the creation process as well as from the opportunity to learn from Dickinson scholars.

"It gave me an idea of other things that one can do outside of teaching in the classroom to be involved in education," Eaton, whose career plans involve becoming a college professor, said.

The exhibit is on display starting today and running through June 4. In March, the Homestead is open Wednesdays and Saturdays; from April through May, it is open Wednesdays through Saturdays. Hours change seasonally; call 542-8161 for information.

Williams said that he had planned on bringing statistics for Latinos and Asians, but recently had to attend a family funeral and was unable to.

He said that many issues have worked against blacks achieving the same economic status as whites. One of these is transportation. In recent years, with Boston as an exception, jobs have moved from the cities to suburbs. Public transportation has not caught up with this, leaving blacks that live in the city unemployed. Also, many businesses get the collateral to begin, from their families. So, if families don't have the start-up, black businesses are not created.

Williams further explained the black-white economic situation by giving some economic history. He said that in the early 1900's there was a period of suburbanization, which created much wealth for whites, but few blacks because of restricted covenants on housing policies. Only whites were allowed to build and purchase houses, resulting in blacks moving into the city. Black slaves who were craftsmen shared their trades with white immigrants after the Civil War and helped to create worker's unions, Williams said, only to be forced out of them later. It was not until 1962 that up to two thirds of blacks were covered by Social Security, because "when it began in 1935, agricultural, domestic and low wage workers [positions mainly held by blacks] were not eligible," he said.

"The end of segregation does not mean the end of racism," Williams said. "We need new ways of thinking [about the problem.] "Though ideally, legally we are the same, in terms of socio-economic things, we are all different."

Williams said that there are opportunity structures for everyone, as well as constraint structures.

"A lot of these issues affect all of us. People are blinded by ideas that those on welfare are poor blacks and poor Latinos, and the ideas associated with them," he said.

Williams did mention that while blacks have moved up in employment, the Latinos are filling in the jobs that blacks left behind, such as cleaning jobs.

"The idea [some people have about this] is, Why didn't you just pull yourself up by the bootstraps? Well, you can't if you don't have any bootstraps," said Tene Howard, student from Amherst College and co-chair of the Diversity Educators at the college.

The 12 people attending the workshop were from different activism groups from the college area and community.

By Ker Munthit
Associated Press

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia — The last senior leader of the Khmer Rouge guerrilla army was arrested Saturday and flown to Phnom Penh, where authorities said he will face trial for his alleged role in a regime that killed up to 2 million people.

Soldiers captured Ta Mok, known as "The Butcher" for his ruthlessness, near the northern border with Thailand, senior Cambodian generals said.

The one-legged guerrilla chief topped the most-wanted list of senior Khmer Rouge figures after the death last year of the movement's leader, Pol Pot.

Race-ing into the unknown

History was made on the UMass, Amherst campus Feb. 22 as Chancellor David K. Scott publicly announced the end of affirmative action as we know it. Meant to inform, the statement has unleashed mass confusion and produced more questions than it has answered. Does this mean that minority enrollment is going to drop? Exactly how does UMass carry out its admissions process currently? And what does any of this have to do with the national, right-wing movement to end affirmative action policies in public and private institutions?

According to the University, commitment to affirmative action has not changed. What will change are the criteria for what constitutes "diversity." Traditionally, affirmative action was only intended to aid women and racial/ethnic minorities. Now, along with these categories, it will be broadened to include cultural, geographic, and socio-economic differences. Why this change? There are two reasons.

In November of last year, a Massachusetts court ruled that the Boston Latin School could no longer use race preferences in its admissions. UMass is under no legal obligation to "reform" itself yet has done so anyway out of fear of a potential lawsuit. The second reason is that UMass wants to conform admissions policies to the new definition of diversity in these "changing times."

Scott argues that admissions policies have always changed in tandem with society's shifting definition of diversity. This new modification simply reflects the definition currently en vogue. The supposed aim is to enhance diversity and recognize people who overcome socio-economic barriers, as well as those of race and gender, because they are significant achievements and should be considered in admission decisions. With these intentions, I have no conflict.

The problem lies in the potential dilution and abandonment of a commitment to secure adequate representation of racial minorities specifically. Let us say that the University's previous standard for ensuring diversity in the incoming class is based mainly on race and ethnicity — assuming that women are well-represented. Latched onto this desire for diversity is the affirmative action imperative, particularly for racial/ethnic minorities. To achieve both of these goals, the admissions office sets up a target percentage of the incoming class to be made up of students of color. Under the new policy, that same target percentage may now be filled with low-income white students along with students of color — for now they too, fulfill the criteria of what constitutes diversity. Hypothetically, the University could claim it is fulfilling its commitment to diversity and affirmative action, even as minority enrollment declines. Yet the University denies that this will happen.

> "UMass is under no legal obligation to "reform" itself yet has done so anyway out of fear of a potential lawsuit."
> Richard Aviles

Here are two good reasons to distrust their sincerity. One has to do with the University's troubled history with maintaining adequate ALANA representation. Two and a half years ago, undergraduates took over Goodell to force the University to improve its poor performance in admitting and retaining ALANA students. The promises made in the subsequent negotiations were quickly forsaken. ALANA graduate enrollment has been in steady decline, especially where African-Americans are concerned. During contract negotiations with the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), the administration was particularly resistant to including articles about ALANA recruitment. With such a track record, how can one not be cynical?

But the real giveaway is in the timing of the measure. In Chancellor Scott's perspective, as "the country's ideas of diversity continue to evolve, so do the admissions policies necessary to reach our goals." Put so simply, one could easily conclude that such "evolution" of national "ideas of diversity" is something that just happens — like the weather — and is beyond human control or conflict.

Nothing could be further from the truth. Since the 1970s, right-wing campaigns have persistently attacked many of the gains made in the civil rights movement. Unfortunately, they have been relatively successful in galvanizing the latent racist attitudes and economic frustration of the white majority into condemning federal social programs/policies as "special privileges" for people of color. The termination of Aid to Families with Dependent Children (otherwise known as "welfare reform"), anti-immigrant laws, and the November decision of the Massachusetts court are all part of this national right-wing trend. If these are the influences on the changing "ideas of diversity," then we have a great deal to worry about.

Affirmative action is not, nor has it ever been, a sufficient remedy for removing historically ingrained racist beliefs and practices. But in the absence of attempts to systemically address the root causes of racism, defending what little we do have is a necessary step in forcing current discussions about race to a more sophisticated level. In this spirit, the University should immediately host a community forum to make a final decision on the issue. We need to know what current admissions policies are and how the new policy will work towards increasing minority enrollment as well as enrollment of students from low-income families, regardless of their race. We can not allow them to come out with new promises until they have first complied with the old ones.

Richard Aviles is a UMass graduate student.

Letters to the Editor

There's no justice for all

To the editor:

This letter is in response to Gary Mendese's column about affirmative action. My main concern is for those out there who don't know what affirmative action means and might be persuaded to become opponents of the practice on account of a badly written article.

First of all, I'd like to clarify a few issues concerning this University's practice. As stated in Thursday's meeting of the pro-affirmative action task force, affirmative action has never been a policy. It has only been a practice.

The other fact that I want students to know is that this University has never admitted a student solely based on race. Race has been a factor, along with academics, work experience, talents, community service and other criteria.

I believe that Gary wrote a very patronizing article. His usage of the word "morons" to describe affirmative action proponents was rude and should not be acceptable. Furthermore, it showed his lack of tact and civility when it comes to a debate. His article also had an anti-GEO tone, which has nothing to do with the affirmative action fight that we are in. If you don't like the GEO, Gary, then write an article titled, "I don't like the GEO."

This brings up another good point. What possessed you to write such a title as "And justice for all?" How can you, as a white person, talk to blacks and other minorities about what justice is? We have been the focus of injustice ever since the creation of this country. You benefit from a system that has been based and still is grounded on the sweat and toil of African-Americans and other minorities. And racism is still very much alive. Your usage of one of this country's most important slogans as a title further amplifies your disgusting sarcasm about the meaning of justice. Have you read any other history book other than the textbook in your high school U.S. history class? Gary, when it comes to justice and fairness, you don't know jack.

The most infuriating part of your article, though, was your belief that somehow you have the power to decide who deserves to be here. You stated that if you needed affirmative action to get in, you didn't deserve to get in. Let me break it down for you, Gary. Many minority students have a 3.0 GPA and have to work outside of high school. Often, they come from high schools that are not up to par with their white counterparts' schools, and their academic training for the SATs is not as good. This University and others rely heavily on SAT scores (a test proven to be biased against minorities), and it shouldn't be surprising that whites would have an advantage over minorities.

I want to stress that affirmative action does not bump qualified white students out for non-qualified minorities. It only allows for a heavier consideration of race and other background data than SAT scoring when it comes to admission. Using this method, minorities have a much better chance to enter a University which otherwise might ignore the fact that their school did not successfully train them for the SATs. This is the true way to achieve diversity on campus.

"Education" may equal ignorance

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Gary Mendese's recent column on the state of affirmative action. ("And justice for all," on Thursday March 4, 1999.)

It seems a given that Mr. Mendese's column will be met with much negative criticism. Assuredly, many readers will be appalled by his naive over-simplification of such a controversial issue. Others will lambast his curt dismissal of the abilities of students admitted to the University through affirmative action. Still others will take offense to his unimaginable characterization of the GEO and its role at UMass.

I, however, feel that he should be thanked.

Thank you, Gary, for demonstrating to the readership of the Collegian that a student who works hard and gets good grades will not necessarily make a positive contribution to our campus community. I hope that the administration will consider your example when discussing the factors that should go into admissions decisions.

Scott Croshier Northampton

JSU is multicultural

To the editor:

I'm responding to an article in last Friday's (March 5, 1999) Multicultural Affairs section entitled "My jungle fever: A look at an interracial relationship."

I appreciated Kristen Cadoff's eloquent description of her determination to maintain her interracial relationship despite disapproval from peers and parents. I objected, however, to her sweeping generalization about the "intolerances of Jewish and white America."

To speak on behalf of my own community, the Jewish Student Union has made a concerted effort to reach out to diverse groups on campus. For example, JSU is joining with ALANA to run a Multicultural Passover Seder on April 22. Judaism teaches us that every human was created in the image of "G-d" and therefore deserves to be treated equally. Clearly, Ms. Cadoff's assumption does not reflect reality.

Remember when tattoos were intimidating? When only really strong, bad guys or really ugly trash women had them? I sure do. But have you noticed that has largely ceased to be the case?

Rob Schulze

These thoughts came to my mind as I was sitting on a couch reading a year-old Rolling Stone in Connecticut while several of my friends were becoming permanently inked for life.

Now, I've never hung out with a rough crowd. Most of these people wrote for the high school paper with me, and lemme tell ya, The Eagle was even less masculine and intimidating than the Collegian. These are all genuinely nice, kind people who wouldn't intentionally give anyone an Indian Sunburn, let alone a noogie, and there they were, becoming tattooed. For a while I just couldn't understand it.

Perhaps my problem was that I still associated tattoos with rebels and hell–raisers, rock stars and hookers. If I were sitting on a couch in Connecticut while Ozzy was getting a tattoo, that would be different, because Ozzy is the kind of guy who should have tattoos. Afterwards he might urinate on the couch.

> "Perhaps my problem was that I still associated tattoos with rebels and hell–raisers, rock stars and hookers."

Nowadays, of course, everybody has ink on them. Tattoos have become a major trend, like body piercings, which is another thing that I don't understand, especially piercings in certain areas. True story. I was staying after school in the fourth grade and I went to the bathroom and caught my penis in the fly while attempting to zip my pants. I am still in pain from that incident today. And I see pictures of people with barbells down there. Barbells that I couldn't curl in the gym, just hangin' around, propelled downward by the powerful force of gravity yet held up by...let's not think about that any longer.

But at least you can take piercings out for, say, an interview with IBM or an audience with the Pope. Tattoos are there forever. That really cool guy you see with the Aztec turtles around his arm is someday going to be a saggy old guy with an irregular bladder and hair loss who drinks Ensure for lunch... and Aztec turtles around his saggy, mushy, old man's upper arm. The definition of coolness, eh?

And people are rushing out to get them like you wouldn't believe. They have become an official trend, and it takes a lot for me to notice trends. The last time I was up on a trend was when I owned a red slap–bracelet, so for me to see this tattoo thing means that a whole lot of people have been getting them– people that normally wouldn't go anywhere near them.

The Logic Lobe in my brain, the part that does calculus problems and reads books, knows all the downsides of tattoos. Then there's the other part of my brain (what I'll call the Guy Lobe), the part that plays video games and watches pro–wrestling, and whenever that part of my brain sees a tattoo it yells at the top of it's lungs, "Cool! Why don't I have one of those?"

When I was in this tattoo shop it was like there was an angel on one shoulder and a devil on the other, and each was speaking his piece. The Logic Lobe was lecturing me on permanence versus trendiness and how I would look 20 years from now, while the Guy Lobe was screaming in a drunken rage about spades and grinning skulls. I almost exploded.

I think I might have done it. In the end though, the deciding factor was money. What saved me from permanent marking was the mere fact that tattoos are really, really expensive. I didn't have the cash for anything more expensive than a small and very feminine butterfly, and the Guy Lobe almost puked on that idea. So I managed to escape without any damage. The Logic Lobe was quite smug: the Guy Lobe called me a candy–ass.

What's my point? That I sort of understand why people are getting this done to them, even if thus far I have managed to resist the lure of the ink. That just because you don't break up bars and commit random felonies, doesn't mean it isn't cool to get a tattoo.

Plus I'm already saving up for the bloody gore–infested large–breasted demon soon to decorate my inner thigh.

Belizaire spreads word of movement

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

Word of the movement and protests against the recent decision to eliminate affirmative action has spread throughout the Five-College area. Task force groups have been formed and mission statements have been issued.

"Our mission is to establish and maintain a diverse community here at the University of Massachusetts," said President of the Black Student Union, Jeff Belizaire. "Establishing that goal within the confines of the law and guaranteeing access to high graduation for all students are definitely part of our mission."

The process has begun and efforts at real dialogue with the administration are under way.

We are in the process of urging the administration to rescind the new policy on admission and set a startup date for a new policy to take effect in Fall of 2000," said Belizaire.

According to Belizaire, the new policy should be the result of research and study by a committee.

"This research committee should be comprised of graduate students, undergraduate students, faculty, and staff," Belizaire said.

The goal of this group is to examine the issues related to affirmative action and the administration's retreat at UMass.

"The group will also assist in with effective and efficient ways of recruiting and increasing the number of students of color and low income students," said Belizaire.

According to Belizaire, a task force has been formed. This task force is divided into three areas: media relations, negotiation committee, and the education committee.

The issues surrounding affirmative action, which was initiated in 1965 by an executive order from President Johnson, has caused hundreds of students to gather and plan actions to reverse the decision by the UMass administration. Meetings have been held in several Campus Center rooms: the Student Union Building, and the New Africa House.

Educational "teach-ins" have been scheduled to educate the campus community and surrounding communities on affirmative action. On March 10, at 7 p.m. in room 164 of the Campus Center, the history and purposes of affirmative action will be announced. On March 24, at 7 p.m. in the New Africa House a similar town-hall will be held— this one geared towards the surrounding communities.

According to Belizaire, on Thursday, March 11, a rally has been scheduled, and educational information will be passed out. The 12 p.m. rally will take place on the steps of the Student Union Building.

"It is important for folks to support this movement in light of the fact that people before — black and white — sacrificed and died so that we can have equal access to mainstream America. Therefore it is up to us to uphold this legacy," Belizaire said.

Getting involved in the stock market

Investing 101 is to help direct you and give you some basic direction and understanding about investing and provide you with some tools that can help you meet your financial goals.

Smart investment decisions have been a fundamental reason for the success of the average individual investor and his or her family. Have you ever thought about investing in stocks? Think you don't have the money? Well think again with as much as $50-$100 you can start investing in companies like Glaxo Wellcome, General Electric and Wrigley (Wm.) the maker of Doublemint and Big Red bubble gum. Start your search with companies and or brands that you like and buy consistently. Research companies that have long track records of sales and growth. Don't let this deter your interest in investing. The best defense against losing money is research and strategy. So before you plan on buying stock do your homework first and foremost. Don't know what a Ticker symbol is or where to find it? What about a Proxy Statement or a 10-K? When you start to invest these words will become familiar and important in your research and ultimately in your decisions. I'd like to tell you about a program called Dividend Reinvestment Plans. Wal-Mart, Exxon and Wendy's are just a few companies that offer these plans to individual investors who don't have the big bucks to invest. You will be able to invest $25-$5000 a month depending on the companies and of course, your minimum and maximum dollar contribution. As a long term investor your portfolio growth will depend on your ability to make future cash investments.

Understanding the race concept

The word "race" is a part of everyone's mental dictionary. But what does "race" really mean? Similar to other words we use, its meaning and derivation are not questioned. "Race," in reality is an abstract word without a true meaning. Yet, it is very easy, just as it was easy for myself, to not question the social definition of "race." This definition we use to categorize people was embedded in our minds at an early age. It still lingers there today, coming out in order to describe a certain group of people based on their phenotype. The image of one group of people dominating another because of their appearance is re-enforced throughout everything Americans read and see on television.

In this age we have the ability to learn from history's mistakes and make a new future, one based on the equality of all people. The way to do that is to go back to the roots of the word "race" and figure out why we still feel the need to employ it in the form of racism.

The system of racism was first developed to benefit one group of people by means of degrading another. For what reason? Power and greed. Personally, these words do not define me and I have faith that there is a large population of people who would agree. I see no benefits in putting down another human because of their outward appearance. It seems that the power of "whiteness" within this country is something that white people are born with. Removing the words racism and "race" from our dictionaries is not enough. White people need to surrender their weapons of privilege, so that simple equality may shine through all of us, as a whole.

> "White people need to surrender their weapons of privilege, so that simple equality may shine through all of us, as a whole."
> Mollie Beirne

What are the roots of "race" and racism? Approximately 500 years ago, Europeans attempted to turn gold into a commodity for profit. Yet, the gold did not have the benefits the Europeans had desired. So they decided to use human beings as a source of labor to replace the gold within their economy. In order to have human beings become a commodity they had to dehumanize them. This led to the development of the "race" concept.

Linnaeus, a Swedish naturalist, was the first to create the categories of humans based on their appearance. He created four groups of humans based on their phenotype and assigned certain attributes to these groups. According to Linnaeus, the Americans were tenacious, contented, free, and ruled by custom. The Europeans were light, lively, inventive, and ruled by rights and laws. The Asians were stern, haughty, stingy, and ruled by opinion. The Africans were cunning, negligent, and ruled by opinion. It is obvious that Linnaeus authorized himself to stereotype people in a negative way, therefore, making Europeans appear dominant and all others inferior. These categorizations were the justification for slavery. In 1455 the Pope issued a Papal Bull telling the Europeans to "...reduce to servitude all infidels." Infidels, in his words, were people who were not Catholic. It is clear to see that although "race" means nothing, it was developed to benefit the Europeans who felt it their right to conduct the slave trade. The slave trade has caused 400 years of oppression, and American people are foolish to think that oppression is not evident in the 20th century.

The slave trade was the Europeans way of maintaining the "race" concept. Yet even though it is almost 200 years after the abolition of the slave trade, racism is still active because the word "race" is still being taught to young people at this moment. It has been necessary to teach young people a dishonest history in order to preserve the foundation and integrity of the United States. In truth, this country was not founded on freedom, as we are taught, because if it were, all people who came here would have been free; rather, it was founded on mercantilism. The reason why the Europeans came to the "New World" was to colonize and to make a profit. Similarly, during the "scramble for Africa" (1885- 1945). Europeans were not concerned that they were creating the African Diaspora, they just wanted to make a profit, sadly, at the expense of a culture. It is safe to say that the reason we are not taught the truth about our history is because those who hold the majority of power (white people) do not want us to believe that the Europeans (who founded this country) were wrong for what they did. The basis of this country's wealth was built on slavery. If white people disallow themselves to have the power associated with "whiteness", this country, as a whole, can begin building true freedom and equality. Isn't it about time?

Deeper than just hard facts

As I was writing this article, I was feeling extremely good about myself. How are you feeling at this point in time?

But why am I feeling good? First, I am a young Haitian- American who has received physical and verbal anguish such as "you ain't shit n——," or "you don't belong here..." from my friends and associates that I have met with in my lifetime. Yet, through my discomfort with certain people, I've learned how to appreciate the little blessings of life which have helped me feel better about myself: Daily hugs from my dearest of friends, my Haitian music, and my five senses of life: speech, touch, taste, sight, and hearing. The appreciation comes deep within my heart, 'cause if they didn't exist, the happiness that flows within me wouldn't have been developed.

Second, I am happy that I and certain members of the University community who fall under the affirmative action policy received the opportunity to further our education.

As I see it, if the acting policy was not mandated in the early 70s, I can honestly admit that my status at our prestigious University wouldn't have come true. My reasoning is based on the way admissions handles the acceptance process. Under their policy, there are six categories to consider when accepting a student. As I see it now, after my high school career, I fell in the lowest category. Under their standards of acceptance, I was viewed as an "academic risk." This was the result of extremely poor SAT scores.

But with the help of the affirmative action policy, (a policy which isn't based on reserving seats) I was given the chance to better my education. With the help of the policy, I have access to better teaching, an opportunity to better myself, my personality, and I am learning the means of survival. Because I had received poor public schooling from my high school, and I come from a low socio-economic environment, the policy took these and other factors in to consideration. And since my debut here at the University of Massachusetts, I've earned the good grades from a few of the toughest courses on this campus, and I've learned that my SAT scores didn't determine my academic success here.

But what I want to stress to you most about affirmative action is what it has produced since it's debut at this University. When you think of the Registered Student Organizations (RSO) on this campus consider, Haitian Student Association, African Student Association, Casa–Dominicana, Cape Verdean Student Alliance, Asian American Association, Black Student Union, Boundaries, Born Again Students in Christ, Boriquas Unidos, etc. Generally, the students who volunteer their time for these organizations, were helped by affirmative action. I am not saying every person of color who attends the University is a product of the affirmative action policy. I just want you to understand that if the students weren't given access to a better education, many of the organizations listed would not be still standing.

> "Because I had received poor public schooling from my high school, and I come from a low socio–economic environment, the policy took these and other factors in to consideration."
> Stanley Sterlin

Now let's speak hypothetically — if the students of Boriquas Unidos who were assisted by affirmative action were not granted acceptance, who would celebrate and teach the students about Puerto Rican Heritage? If the students who established the Black Student Union were not granted acceptance, who would have made it a point to celebrate Black History Month, or recruit some great and powerful speakers like Atallah Shabazz, and Kwame Ture and Erick Ture. And lastly, if my Haitian squad members who fell under the policy of affirmative action, who would teach about the language of Kreyol, our dances, our konpa music.

You see, if you abolish the acting policy, you deny the culturally unexposed person the ability to learn new things about different cultures. For instance, I was uneducated in 10 ways. Because of the policy which granted me acceptance to UMass, I have learned to say hello in 10 languages.

I understand that what I've mentioned is a small criteria to consider, but understand with knowledge of others cultures other doors will open. The policy has brought an enormous amount of diverse people to UMass, and with diverse people, you can share and learn more knowledge than any book(s) can capture.

Lastly, I'm assuming that affirmative action has brought some great people in your lives at UMass, who have changed you spiritually, physically, mentally, and culturally. It has helped many students better their education. It has given students means for preparation to a well paying job. So without it, would I still be happy? I say no. What do you think?

Rallies and protests still vehicle for progress despite recent attacks

Last week there was a plethora of views expressed in the Collegian concerning affirmative action and the rallies that ensued. One article gave no justice to what affirmative action in the school or anywhere else really is. There were also some spirited quotes made by Paul Ferro during the SGA meeting. By dispelling their misconceptions we can move towards a unified consensus on affirmative action

Since the University of Massachusetts is an institution of learning, it is important to properly educate each other on the issues so as not to remain ignorant. Recent newspaper articles have taken an anti-affirmative action stance. Getting past the silly name calling, there were simply many uneducated assumptions.

First of all, affirmative action does not incorporate "underrepresented minorities according to race only." Race is used as a factor in the admissions process. To say race is the only criteria for minorities belittles every single ALANA student as if the race is the only way they can get into college.

Secondly, "numerically unqualified" students are not accepted into any educational institution. That too is a common misconception about affirmative action. Next, the term minority does mean a lesser number. But it also means a group that differs from the predominate section by one or more characteristic (e.g. race, gender class, religion) and as a result, often subjected to differential treatment- especially discrimination. During and after colonialism, natives of their country made up the majority but did not have power to govern. In South Africa blacks were the majority in number only. Women make up the majority of the world population but are in the minority, and therefore face discrimination in all aspects of their lives. Lastly, slavery may be over but its legacy continues. It has been a gradual process that is continually hindered by excluding minorities from a decent education and means of moving up in the world.

Rosaline Valcimond

Paul Ferro, president of the Republican Club, during the SGA meeting asked, "Do you want to judge people on their merits or the color of their skin?" The reality is more often than not, people are judged by their skin color. Do you think Clarence Thomas was actively recruited just on his merits? The Republican Party approved Justice Thomas because he is a black conservative. Mr. Ferro also said the rally " was an amusing idea, but if you want to change it, go to court, put your money where your mouth is, otherwise no one will give a rat's ass." Maybe Mr. Ferro would be more supportive of rallies if someone gave a rat's ass about Republican Club rallies. As a political science major, Mr. Ferro ought to know that civil disobedience is a very effective method in changing laws. The lawyer Mohandas Gandhi viewed civil disobedience as a means for social and political action.

Rallies have been making a difference lawyer–free since the beginning of America's history and everywhere else in the world. Gandhi saw protesting as a way to raise the consciousness of people on a particular issue within a wider political struggle. Dr. Martin Luther King was another strong supporter of rallying. He believed that a rally provides a peaceable means to draw attention to reform. The Supreme Court is rarely ahead of the public opinion. It is up with the public.

The people who rallied did raise the public consciousness on affirmative action. They did more in a week than any lawyer could have done in a year. Now that consciousness is raised, it is up to the organizers to bring the affirmative action to the next level — dinpel and educate.

Mary's First "Perfect" at Pearl St.

MARY'S FIRST
Pearl Street Night Club
Feb. 6

NORTHAMPTON — For those that thought they would seek shelter at Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton last Saturday night, rising superstar band Mary's First quickly proved the crowd wrong. With their roaring form of power- pop the band put on an exhilarating performance and displayed their incredible craftsmanship.

The show was the band's first area appearance since they opened at the William D. Mullins Center last semester and they made sure that those who braved the elements would not be left disappointed.

The storm was quick to his as the band showcased a sharp introduction cut before smoothly sliding to "She's Good." The catchy "Do You Ever" offered the audience a special treat, as it is an early Mary's First song.

"Perfect" was simply perfect, while "For Awhile" seems only to improve each time it is performed.

Guitarist Tommy Pluta quickly broke into a Van Halen cover that served as the lead into the band's delightful trademark, "I Know." Lead vocalist Dana Hammett then dismissed his guitar so that the band could perform one of their splendid newer cuts, "Heaven's Falling."

As if the band could not play with any more energy then it already had, Mary's First then erupted with a powerful, high-energy version of "Accept Me" to conclude the evening.

The band's debut album is entering the final stages and should be released by summer's end. It was recorded at Jake's Kitchen in West Village, New York City by John DeNicola and Tommy Allen.

Even without a release, Mary's First has been a favorite on the airwaves with "I Know" capturing the majority of the attention.

The band, according to drummer Chris "Critter" Ryan, "is hoping to really start playing the area as much as possible and try to develop a strong following."

Singles soundtrack brings the grunge back

The official movie description for Cameron Crowe's Singles reads, "a romantic comedy about six of the city's young people, most of whom live in the same apartment building, and whose lives revolve around Seattle's ever- expanding music scene...the soundtrack is a grunge fanatic's dream, with the likes of Soundgarden, Pearl Jam and Mudhoney."

The soundtrack isn't just the highlight of the film, but an integral part of the Singles experience. Several of the band members that are involved in the soundtrack also have cameo roles in the film. Eddie Vedder, Stone Gossard and Jeff Ament from Pearl Jam and Chris Cornell from Soundgarden all play band members in the fictitious band Citizen Dick.

If music be the food of love, may Shakespeare be the food of Hollywood.

Two weeks before the Academy Awards, the studio that produced Shakespeare in Love is presenting an extensive ad campaign to promote their acclaimed movie for best picture, as well as for the 12 other nominations that the film received. All the attention is on the Miramax movie to vie for the top award in a race with Steven Spielberg's Saving Private Ryan. Its stars — Gwyneth Paltrow, Geoffrey Rush and Judi Dench — are the talk of the West Coast, as Hollywood rejoices in the new Shakespearean success.

It's classic Hollywood irony, since Shakespeare in Love almost never got made, and worse — almost starred Julia Roberts.

Shakespeare, naturally, was never considered a dollar- making source of material for the film industry. Costume dramas, especially English ones, are inevitably looked upon with the same sort of attention as one looks upon West Virginian sculpture, or West Virginians in general. But with the success of Love, and the powerful Elizabeth, those stuffy Brits are back in style.

Which means more Shakespeare. Lots more. The unfortunate aspect to this is that unlike Shakespeare in Love, new Hollywood films involving the Bard feel the need to update him to modern times, a la Romeo and as the epicenter of the new wave of music known as "grunge." The title was no doubt inspired by the attire associated with it: ripped jeans, dirty flannels, and Converse All-Stars were their trademark. It was a year after the release of Pearl Jam's enormously popular album Ten and Nirvana's mythic Nevermind. The same year also saw the release of another grunge classic, Soundgarden's Badmotorfinger.

The movement gained momentum with the hit single "Smells Like Teen Spirit." Oddly enough two of the more influential grunge bands, Nirvana and Temple of the Dog (which included members of Mother Love Bone and Soundgarden) are absent from this otherwise definitive soundtrack.

The compilation is undeniably a showcase for Pearl Jam, who were beginning to match Nirvana's notoriety in the scene. Included are two outstanding tracks that were both written and performed by the band. "State of Love and Trust" and "Breath" represent the best of their early work.

Other highlights of the album include a cover of the Led Zeppelin tune "Battle of Evermore," eloquently performed by a girl band called The Lovemongers. In a hint of things to come there is also a more mellow song entitled "Seasons" performed by Chris Cornell in a solo endeavor. The collection ends with "Drown," a long ballad performed by newcomers from Chicago, The Smashing Pumpkins, who had just released their debut album Gish.

The album is definitely an exercise in nostalgia; only two of the major bands are still thriving in somewhat original form. Both the album and the film are relics of a music genre that died with the death of Kurt Cobain. If you haven't regressed to the earlier part of this decade lately, this is the perfect vehicle.

Director Kubrick dead at 70

By Robert Barr
Associated Press

LONDON — Stanley Kubrick, the director of 2001: A Space Odyssey and A Clockwork Orange, whose films often puzzled and shocked audiences only to end up as classics, died yesterday at his home in England, his family said. He was 70.

Police were summoned to Kubrick's rural home north of London yesterday afternoon, said authorities in Hertfordshire, where he was certified dead. "There are no suspicious circumstances," police said.

Kubrick's family announced his death, and said there would be no further comment.

Kubrick's films included Spartacus in 1960, Lolita in 1962, Dr. Strangelove, in 1964, 2001 in 1968 and A Clockwork Orange in 1971.

He also made Barry Lyndon, released in 1975, The Shining in 1980 and Full Metal Jacket in 1987.

Malcolm McDowell, who starred in A Clockwork Orange, issued a statement through his publicist calling Kubrick "a heavyweight of my life."

"He was the last great director of that era. He was the big daddy," said McDowell.

Kubrick's latest film, Eyes Wide Shut, is still slated for release on July 16, Warner Bros. said yesterday. Tom Cruise and Nicole Kidman star in the story of jealousy and obsession, which Kubrick made in great secrecy.

"He was like family to us and we are in shock and devastated," Cruise and Kidman said in a statement released by their publicist.

Director Steven Spielberg issued a statement describing Kubrick as a "grand master of filmmaking."

"He created more than just movies. He gave us complete environmental experiences," Spielberg said.

Kubrick was born July 26, 1928, in New York. At 17, he was hired as a staff photographer by Look magazine, which had been impressed by a picture Kubrick had snapped on the day President Franklin D. Roosevelt died.

While working at Look, he studied film by attending screenings at the Museum of Modern Art.

"I was aware that I didn't know anything about making films, but I believed I couldn't make them any worse than the majority of films I was seeing. Bad films gave me the courage to try making a movie," Kubrick once said.

In 1951, he sold a 16-minute documentary about a boxer, Day of the Fight, to the RKO film studio.

Kubrick was drafted by actor Kirk Douglas into the film Spartacus when the production — then the most expensive ever mounted in the United States — ran into trouble. The film, about a slave revolt in ancient Rome, included some footage shot by the original director, Anthony Mann, and Kubrick did not regard the finished product as a great success.

"I tried with only limited success to make the film as real as possible but I was up against a pretty dumb script which was rarely faithful to what is known about Spartacus," Kubrick told an interviewer.

Lolita, starring James Mason and Shelley Winters, was based on Vladimir Nabokov's controversial novel about a professor who is sexually obsessed with a 12-year-old girl. The work was filmed in Britain, in part because of censorship problems, and thereafter Kubrick was based in Britain.

Dr. Strangelove, starring Peter Sellers and George C. Scott, was a black comedy about nuclear war released in the early 1960's during a period of great fears over the bomb and Cold War tensions.

2001, a science fiction film about the evolution of man and humanity's place in the universe, combined dazzling visual imagery and an inspired use of music. It proved to be a great success for Kubrick.

In an interview with Playboy magazine, Kubrick said he had "tried to create a visual experience, one that bypasses verbalized pigeonholing and directly penetrates the subconscious with an emotional and philosophic content ... just as music does...You're free to speculate as you wish about the philosophical and allegorical meaning."

A Clockwork Orange, set in a violent future, is a graphic film about a young thug who carries out rapes and beatings before being sent to prison where he is brainwashed.

The film was one of Kubrick's most controversial — it was even disparaged by Anthony Burgess, whose novel was the basis of the film, and Kubrick eventually removed it from screens in Britain.

Kubrick was married three times, first in 1948 to Toba Metz, then after divorcing he married Ruth Sobotka in 1954. Their marriage ended three years later, and in 1958, he wedded Suzanne Harlan, with whom he had three daughters.

Details about funeral arrangements were not immediately available.

One of the newest films based on the work of Shakespeare is 10 Things I Hate About You, based on The Taming of the Shrew.

Juliet with Leonardo DiCaprio. Contemporary retellings of great works, thus, often fall into two categories: slick but vapid (Great Expectations), or slick and creative adaption of Othello, called O, again set in high school and again starring Stiles.

Perhaps more anticipated is a recreation of one of Shakespeare's least known plays, Titus Andronicus. That movie will star Oscar-winners Jessica Lange and Anthony Hopkins.

By far, though, the most interesting project is Branagh's. The actor-director has taken over for Laurence Olivier as the king of modern Shakespeare, with productions like Henry V, Much Ado About Nothing, Othello and an epic version of Hamlet. His new production of Love's Labour's Lost, which he wrote, directs and stars in, also features Nathan Lane and Alicia Silverstone.

Even considering this recent onslaught of Elizabethan influence, Hollywood has had no shortage of Shakespeare. According to the Internet Movie Database, there have been 346 movies or TV movies based on or inspired by the ouvre and life of the Bard. Thirty-three of these were interpretations of Hamlet.

We'll also get another Hamlet, this time updated to modern times and starring Ethan Hawke, Casey Affleck, Stiles and, yes, Bill Murray as Polonius. And there's an adaption of Othello, called O, again set in high school and again starring Stiles.

UMass seniors finish with W on senior day

By Matt Melo
Collegian Correspondent

The Curry Hicks Cage was the stage for a curtain call of sorts. A class of seven gymnastics seniors made their way out onto the floor of the Cage for the last time in an emotional Senior Day in Amherst.

On Saturday, Amy Caputo, Betsy Colucci, Sara Kelly, Michelle LoPresti, Rokia Madore, Jennifer Pokrana and Anita Sanyal were honored by coach Dave Kuzara prior to the day's quad-meet with M.I.T., Yale and Bridgeport. UMass upended their visitors with team score of 193.825. Yale put in a strong effort to take second with 185.825, nipping the Bridgeport Knights who scored a 185.500. M.I.T. rounded out the field with a 171.775.

The Minutewomen (9-4 Overall 4-0 Atlantic-10) are starting to look like a team on a mission. And in the words of Anita Sanyal, "We are just getting started." Sanyal, being a women of her words, won two individual events on the day. She was tops on the balance beam with a 9.900, and the floor exercise with a 9.875. Both scores captured team and personal high honors for the season. Michelle LoPresti won the all-around for a fourth time this season with a 38.575.

The lead was never in jeopardy for the Minutewomen as they came out of the gates running en route to a new season high team total on the vault with a 48.100. Michelle LoPresti anchored the squad with a season high of 9.725. Kuzara opted to showcase his seniors on the vault with Caputo and Madore making their only appearances of the day. Caputo recorded a 9.375 and Madore contributed a 8.950. Sara Kelly also got a shot in an exhibition role flipping to a 9.400.

Depth seems to be a key ingredient to the success of the Minutewomen thus far. The mid-season addition of Jill Fisher and key performances like the one given by Sanyal on Saturday make Kuzara a happy man. "What people don't realize is that we are rounding into shape now. We got Jill Fisher back. The future looks really bright for us."

Much of that depth for UMass proved to be an insurmountable task for the rest the field to overcome. On the floor exercises, the maroon and white did not suffer a score lower than a 9.375, totaling a 48.875. The team was all smiles throughout the routines as they hit their stunts with perfection. Each combination of flips and turns turned out a great reception from the UMass faithful. Sanyal led a trio of gymnasts scoring a 9.800 or better with a 9.875, a new personal high on the season. The latter being Kyla Palombini with a 9.800 and Jill Fisher, making her first appearance of the year on floor emassed a 9.850.

The fever of Senior Day carried through to the balance beam, on which the team tied their previous team high mark of 48.675 set against Alabama last month. Sanyal saved the best for last as she rounded out the event with the previously mentioned 9.900. Mandy Mosby clung to the beam and shuffled her way to a 9.800. LoPresti cushioned her all-around total with a lofty 9.875. Yale's Betty Ky churned out a solid round on the beam with a 9.750, netting her the high score among the Bulldogs.

Another senior took the turn as queen for the day when Jennifer Pokrana won the uneven bars with a 9.875. Her closest competitor happened to be fellow senior Sanyal with a 9.775. The Minutewomen put together a 48.175 on the apparatus, a full two points ahead of runner-up Bridgeport who rallied for a 46.100. Bridgeport's lone highlight came from Terri-Ann Bunchek who swung to a 9.625.

When looking for a turning point to this years campaign for the Minutewomen, look no further than the battle with Alabama in February. Since then UMass has done their best to manhandle their competition, reeling off wins against five of their last six opponents. Another turning point may come up during spring break as the team heads west to tangle with nationally ranked Stanford and a capable Cal State Sacramento group.

"We have been looking forward to this meet for so long. And I have personally been preparing for this meet for so long. I think as a team we could not have done better. I don't think the seniors could have done better. We [the seniors] are definetly close," Sanyal said when referring to senior day.

And after the meet, Kuzara was all about Sanyal. "Today showed what Anita is capable of. Anita I think is going to carry us. If we are looking to somebody. Anita has really stepped it up the last couple of weeks."

Kuzara also applauded the seniors for their hard work commenting, "I really have to hand it to all the seniors. Amy Caputo and Rokia Madore had a good day on the vault. And then lenn Pokrana, here is a kid who did bars for us last year and she is awfully tough to take out of the team line-up when she is hitting scores like she does."

Rounding out the rotation is newcomer Pat Rapp, who was acquired over the off-season from the Kansas City Royals. Rapp had a 5.26 ERA last season with a respectable 12-12 record. The veteran may receive some competition for the fifth rotation spot, most notably from Brian Rose, who is recuperating from an injury, and Jin Ho Cho, who is determined to win his first game in the big leagues in memory of his father, who passed away last May.

The usually stoic Jimmy Williams has shown quite a bit of enthusiasm about the 1999 pitching roster. He has commented on the rare opportunity of working with five starting pitchers that all had 10 or more wins last season.

Worn-out? Tired? Tattered? Not quite. Seasoned, conditioned, and experienced may be more accurate words to describe the 1999 Boston Red Sox starting pitchers. Forget about the Rocket. If these veterans can remain injury free, the rotation is almost certain to be an ominous obstacle to opposing teams.

But then again, nothing is ever certain when it comes to the Red Sox.

Odom's three downs Temple; Beats Rhody

By Ken Berger
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Lamar Odom's season started with an amazing game-winning shot. He sent Rhode Island to the NCAA tournament on Saturday night with another one.

Odom hit a 3-pointer at the buzzer to give the Rams a 62-59 victory over Temple in the Atlantic 10 championship game. Despite two late-season losses to St. Bonaventure and Fordham, the Rams (20-12) are going to the tournament for the second straight year. Odom, who hit the game-winning basket in his Rhode Island debut against Texas Christian, did it again against Temple.

Coming out of a timeout with 6.1 seconds left and the game tied 59-59, Odom got the ball near halfcourt and drove down the left sideline on Keaton Sanders. He jump-stopped about 22 feet from the basket and released the ball with about a second to spare. The ball swished through as the horn sounded, and Odom circled the court and was tackled by teammates and fans.

Odom, the tournament MVP, had 21 points and 10 rebounds, picking up the slack for injured teammate Luther Clay, who had nine points despite a heavily bandaged leg.

Lamont Barnes led Temple (21-10) with 19 points, and Mark Karcher had 16 points but was 5-for-18 from the field. Owls point guard Pepe Sanchez, who missed a 3-pointer with 14 seconds left, was 3-for-16 as Temple shot 35 percent.

The Owls, who beat Rhode Island twice in the regular season, sat dejectedly on the bench for several minutes as the Rams celebrated. Temple hasn't won the A-10 tournament since 1990, but the Owls' strong schedule is expected to earn them a 15th NCAA berth in coach John Chaney's 17 seasons.

Odom, who could be the No. 1 pick in the next NBA draft if he leaves Rhode Island, nearly blew the Rams' chances after getting the rebound on Sanchez's missed 3-pointer. He got the ball with 11 seconds left and dribbled tentatively up the court as coach Jim Harrick screamed for a timeout. They finally got one, but Odom wasted five seconds.

UMass baseball squad opens with two losses

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team opened up its 1999 season on a down note against No. 24 ranked North Carolina State over the weekend in Raleigh, NC.

UMass lost its first two games of the young season on Friday and Saturday against the Wolfpack. The Minutemen fell 12-1 in its season opener, then followed that up with a tough 2-0 defeat the next afternoon. The results of yesterday's game were not available at press time.

Senior co-captain Bill Cooke did not start off his season on the right foot in Friday night's opener. The ace of the UMass staff and a first-team All-Atlantic 10 pick last season, Cooke was touched up for seven runs in four-plus innings.

The Wolfpack jumped on Cooke early and often on Friday, scoring three times in the first to take a 3-0 lead. The hosts would add two more In the third and fourth frames before Cooke was pulled in favor of freshman Jesse Santos.

The Chelmsford product allowed a single run in the fifth before the Wolfpack tacked on four more in the seventh off the rookie for the final margin.

Bryan Mazzaferro scored the lone run for the Minutemen in the seventh inning.

Adrian Acevado led N.C. State on the day with three hits, three runs scored and three RBI.

Saturday's matinee at Doak Field was a far cry from the affair the night before. UMass junior lefty Travis Veracka went five strong innings for the Minutemen, but gave up a two-run home run in the fifth inning that proved to be the difference in a 2-0 loss.

Veracka's only mistake came with two outs in the fifth against N.C. State second baseman Brian Ward. The Wolfpack's No. 3 hitter took a high fastball out of the yard for the only runs of the game.

Aside from Veracka's noble effort, the Minutemen also got a solid effort from their bullpen in the loss. Freshman Brian Hourigan hurled two scoreless innings before sophomore Craig Szado tossed a perfect eighth for UMass.

UMass had opportunities against N.C. State pitchers Rodney Ormond and Dan D'Amato. The Minutemen collected 11 hits on the day, but were unable to push a run across.

Senior co-captain Seth Kaplan led the offensive attack with three hits for the Minutemen. Freshman catcher Chris Morgan and junior second baseman Shaun Skeffington each added two hits for UMass in the defeat.

The Minutemen will again take to the diamond next weekend when they head down to Florida to face the South Florida Bulls in another three game set.

Sox pitching looking good in spring for new campaign

It's two weeks into spring training and so far, the one pitcher that has dominated Boston sports headlines is not even a member of the Red Sox.

When former Sox ace Roger Clemens donned the pinstripes for That Other Team, the current Boston pitching rotation went unnoticed during the clammer. But as the Clemens story becomes buried in the saga of past Red Sotian woes, fans and media have shifted their focus on the pitchers for the season-yet-to-come.

So, what exactly does the pitching staff have to offer us this year?

Despite the perpetual whining of the naysayers that are so annoyingly ubiquitous in Red Sox Nation, the starting rotation may prove to be one of the bright spots of the 1999 season. Yes, the Sox have only one starter (Pedro Martinez) under the age of 31. But while the cynics have already labeled the rotation as creaky and worn-out, this collection of seasoned veterans has the potential to guide the Sox in its quest for the evasive World Series title.

Once again, the pressure to succeed will rest heavily on the shoulders of Martinez. In 1998, the ace battled through stomach pains and a bundle of nerves to finish the season 19-7 in 33 starts with a 2.89 ERA. Martinez learned the hard way that while Boston fans are quick to place their players on pedestals, they will just as swiftly boo, hiss, and criticize a mediocre outing. Not used to being booed by the home crowd, Martinez was rattled by the pressure and was plagued with stomach problems that left him 6 pounds lighter and substantially weaker.

Towards the end of the season, Martinez noticeably loosened up, laughing and joking with his teammates. (Remember the Yoda mask?) After his overdramatized late arrival to spring training due to his father's birthday, Martinez seems comfortable and at ease with his fellow teammates. Now that he has adjusted to the relentless criticism of the Boston media and fans, expect Martinez to reach or exceed 20 wins this season.

Bret Saberhagen was the feel-good story of the season in 1998. Still weak from a severe shoulder injury, Saberhagen wrapped up his first full season since 1995 with an admirable 15-8 record. His efforts earned him the title of Sporting News Comeback Player of the Year.

This season, Saberhagen will see more time on the mound. His goal for the season is to pitch a complete game and pitching coach Joe Kerrigan considers this a reasonable aim. However, more time on the mound may mean a dip in performance for Saberhagen, who last season started most of his games with five or more days rest. As his pitch count increases and he starts more often, Saberhagen's still tender shoulder may respond negatively.

Expect a repeat of Tim Wakefield's strong performance last season. At age 31, Wakefield is at the top of his game and is in superb condition. Last season, he had a career high 17-8 record with a 4.58 ERA. If he can duplicate or improve these stats, the trio of Wakefield, Saberhagen, and Martinez will contribute a powerful one-two-three punch to the rotation.

One of the new faces this season is Mark Portugal, the 36-year-old who pitched with the Phillies last year. A return of his 1999 10-5 record would be a welcome addition to the Sox. Portugal has already proven that he can pitch to success in Fenway Park—last season, he pitched a complete game and led the Phillies to a 3-2 win over the Sox at Boston on June 23.

against the University of Texas-San Antonio. They will need to watch out for teams like Alabama-Birmingham, who received an at-large bid. The Huskies will need to watch for Minnesota, which has the capability of being a threat as well as North Carolina. But the Tar Heels will have to have their best game of the season to upset the Huskies.

The South Region is a disaster. The first No. 1 seed, Auburn that has a realistic shot of being upset by Winthrop. You all may think I'm crazy, but if I was going to pick a bad team to be in the tourney this is it, and Auburn doesn't deserve to be a one seed. Look for three seed St. John's, No. 2 Maryland, Louisville, Ohio St. or Syracuse to do the real damage in this region. Remember South Carolina the past two years- I don't know why they let anyone in from the SEC Conference besides Kentucky.

In the Midwest look for the real battles. UNC- Charlotte/URI will be a great one, Arizona-Oklahoma has a potential to be a barnburner if Sooners come to play. But the best matchups will come in the second round when Kentucky will tip-off against Kansas providing Kansas can beat the MVAC powerhouse Evansville (shouldn't be in). Don't forget Utah either. They are quietly having one of their best years and have earned a two seed with their great defense.

Picks for St. Petersburg and the Final Four- simple- the Dukes out of the East, with ease, Kentucky or Michigan St. will battle for the Midwest. Maryland will avenge the ACC by making It to the final four provided they can get past their own challenge. St. John's who can play with anyone. In the West no one poses a serious threat for UConn, and you can expect UConn-Duke in the finals.

UM hockey defeats Merrimack,4-2

Minutemen take seventh place

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

NORTH ANDOVER — The Massachusetts hockey team rode the stellar performances of sophomore netminder Markus Helanen, second year forward Jeff Turner, and the highlight reel that was Jeff Blanchard's performance to squeak out a 4–2 win over Merrimack College Friday night at the Volpe Complex.

"It was a solid team effort. Everyone played great," Blanchard said.

"It was a big night for us. Our line really stepped it up tonight. Our confidence is pretty high and playing in our system has helped us gain confidence," Turner said.

The win upped the regular season record for the Minutemen to 12–19–2, 8–14–2 in Hockey East. Saturday's win was also huge because it is UMass' second road win in Hockey East in their last three chances. The Minutemen will hope to build confidence from the recent wins both at home and on the road, as they head into the Hockey East playoffs.

The win also marks the first sweep for the UMass hockey program over a Hockey East opponent in a three game series.

DAN SANTELLA / COLLEGIAN

Markus Helanen made 35 saves in 4–2 win over Merrimack allowing UMass to finish at 12–19–2.

"We have won six of our last eight games. As a coach you want the guys to make a run late in the season, and build momentum for the playoffs," said UMass coach Joe Mallen.

The Minutemen used Jeff Blanchard's second goal of the night with under 1:03 remaining to finish off the Warriors. Jeff Turner cleared the puck out of his own end, catching the Warrior defense pinching in too deep. That made it a foot race to the puck. Blanchard won the race and popped the puck into the empty net to finish off the Warriors and secure the win for UMass.

Blanchard and Turner were the two main threats who took care of business offensively for UMass. Blanchard had two goals and an assist on the night, while Turner had one score and two helpers on the evening. Defensively, it was Helanen who saved the day once again for the Minutemen — making 35 saves, while allowing only two goals during the night.

"He has only lost two games in the month of February. We thought he would be a very good goalie in our league but he's played way over the expectations that we had for him as a sophomore. He made some great saves tonight. He's a great kid and good student, I'm just really happy for him," Mallen said.

The Warriors tried to come back from three goals down, but came up short. The Minutemen had a great second period, which followed a scoreless 20 minutes from both schools in the first.

The Minutemen scored three goals mostly on turnovers in the neutral zone. UMass capitalized on the Warriors mistakes and had several breakaways in the second frame and capitalized on most of them. They went into the locker room at the second intermission with a 3–0 lead.

But the Warriors, with their backs against the wall, knew that they had to bring it to the Minutemen in the third period and they did just that. They capitalized on two power play opportunities to cut the UMass lead to 3–2 with a little over 10 minutes remaining in the game.

However, Blanchard came through in the clutch again, to hold off the Warriors and secure the seventh seed in the Hockey East playoffs.

"That may be the best game he has played since he has been here. That's a hard play to make with the goalie pulled," Mallen said. "This was definitely his best game of the year, no question about it."

UMass received its scoring spread out through the second period, first on Turner's early goal from Bryan Kennedy. Then, defenseman Chris Brannen made a terrific pass with 6:03 remaining in the second to find Blanchard for his first goal of the night.

The Minutemen closed out the scoring when Blanchard sent Nick Stephens in on a shorthanded breakaway. Stephens fired a shot past MC goalie Tom Welby with 2:22 to go in the frame. The offensive onslaught in the second period for the Minutemen gave UMass a good base to fight off the power play wave by Merrimack.

The Minutemen secured seventh by defeating the Warriors. The 3–2 Northeastern loss to UMass–Lowell on Friday night was the only thing that prevented the Minutemen from taking the sixth seed.

In terms of who the Minutemen will play in the first round, it came down to the series for first place between New Hampshire and Maine. New Hampshire won both games and secured No. 1 in Hockey East, which gives the Minutemen a series with No. 2 Maine in Orono.

The first round series starts with Maine on Thursday night.

"Going into the playoffs we have a ton of momentum. We can beat anyone in the league. We will upset Maine, BC or UNH [who the Minutemen might play in the first round of the playoffs]. They are going to be scared to play us," UMass captain Dean Stork said.

Minutemen will face Maine

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

NORTH ANDOVER — Things are not all fine and dandy in Orono, Maine right now, and there's no one who is happier to hear that then the Massachusetts hockey team.

The Black Bears, who came into the weekend as the No. 3 team in the nation and the leader in Hockey East, ran into a freight train up in Durham, NH over the weekend — a vehicle otherwise known as the University of New Hampshire Wildcats.

UNH took care of business against Maine in a two–game set that ended the regular season for both teams. The Wildcats took both games against the Black Bears, allowing them to catapult over UMaine and claim the Hockey East regular season championship.

But what does this all mean for the Minutemen? Thanks to that sweep by the Wildcats, UMass will now head north to Orono to face the Black Bears in the quarterfinals of the Hockey East playoffs starting on Thursday night.

"We've been successful against Maine this year," Massachusetts hockey coach Joe Mallen said. "[Whether it's Maine or UNH] we're in [the playoffs], though, and we've really earned our way in."

The statistics would back up Mallen's statement. UMass and Maine split the season series right down the middle at 1–1–1. The Minutemen beat Maine 2–1 on Nov. 15 before following that up with a 1–1 deadlock against the Black Bears the next night at the William D. Mullins Center. Maine recorded a 5–0 win over the Minutemen on Jan. 17 at Alfond Arena.

Both teams will enter this weekend, however, heading in completely opposite directions. UMass is arguably the hottest team in the conference right now and is riding the heels of the hottest goalie in the league, Markus Helanen. Maine, on the other hand, is coming off two disheartening losses to the Wildcats.

"We've got momentum going into the playoffs," said UMass alternate captain Jeff Blanchard following the 4–2 win over Merrimack on Friday night. "We've won five of six and two in a row."

Said Mullen in response to a comment by Warriors coach Chris Serino stating that Helanen is the hottest goalie in the conference right now: "The numbers will back him up. He lost two games in the month of February. We thought he would be a very good goalie in our league but he's played way over the expectations that we had for him as a sophomore."

What may be even more important for the Minutemen though, is the fact that they have started to pick up their play on the road. After failing to pick up a road win in Hockey East in its first nine attempts, UMass had won two of its last three away from the Mullins Center.

Of the three teams who the Minutemen had the possibility of facing in the playoffs heading into the weekend, UMass had its most success against Maine. The Maroon and White dropped all three games to both Boston College and UNH this season.

The bottom line, however, is that the Minutemen are not lacking confidence heading into this weekend. In fact, UMass captain Dean Stork had some thoughts of his own on the upcoming series with the Black Bears.

"We've got a ton of momentum going into the playoffs. We can beat anyone in this league, and we will upset either Maine, BC, or UNH," he said. "Those teams are going to be scared to play us."

And if UMass plays the same way that it did in the final month of the regular season, it may be the underdog Minutemen who find themselves playing in the Fleet Center for the Hockey East semifinals for the first time in school history.

Minutemen fall in struggle to CU

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The cliche goes something like this: The best offense is a good defense. Saturday at the Carrier Dome, the No. 21 Cornell men's lacrosse team used a strong effort from its defense to hold off No. 13 Massachusetts, 5–4.

The game, which was originally scheduled for an afternoon contest in Ithaca, N.Y., was changed to a 6 p.m. tilt at the Carrier Dome because of inclement weather.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Mike Janowicz

Both teams had their fair share of offensive opportunities, as each put over 20 shots on the opposing cages. But Cornell (1–0) held the advantage in groundballs (34–28), faceoffs (7–5) and shots (31–25).

"Our guys were ready. They were well rested," UMass (1– 1) coach Greg Cannella said. "You have to give a lot of credit to Cornell. The way they played, they controlled the situation."

The Big Red were also the first to get on the scoreboard.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Kevin Dell

Sophomore attack Andrew Schardt notched the only score of the first period with 10:32 remaining.

UMass was able to even the score on a Mike Janowicz shot with 9:14 on the clock in the second frame. Cornell put the Minutemen back on the defensive with another scoring tally from Schardt to take a 2–1 advantage.

Kevin Dill deadlocked the score at 2–all with a goal 16 seconds before intermission.

But the Big Red translated an early third–quarter offensive spurt into a 4–2 lead as Sean Steinwald and David Key found the back of the UMass cage.

For the Minutemen, it was sophomore attack John Madigan who provided the second–half firepower. With 6:26 left in the third, Madigan cut the lead to one goal. But before he could score his second of the game, Cornell's Michael Voras put UMass back in the hole by two.

Sophomore Chris Campolettano made his case to be the Minutemen's starting goalie by stopping 13 shots in the complete game.

"He made some great saves, some outstanding saves," Cannella said. "We expected him to do well, he's played very well in practice. This gave him a lot of confidence today."

Freshman goalie Justin Cynar, who hails from Campolettano's hometown of Massapequa, N.Y., made eight saves for the Big Red, including three big stops in the final four minutes.

Minuteman Notes: UMass' next opponent, Fairfield (Saturday at home, 2 p.m.), was hard at work this weekend trying to make a name for itself in the early season. The Stags defeated Harvard, which was ranked 20th in the Face– Off Magazine preseason poll, 13–5... No. 4 Syracuse downed No. 5 Virginia, 14–12, at the Carrier Dome in the game that preceded UMass' contest.

NCAA puts out brackets, "ones" good

Well it's official, the 64 teams have been selected for the NCAA men's college basketball tournament, and every year it seems like you're watching a group of teams you know aren't going anywhere. Where are the teams that belong in this tournament? You need to ask that over–the–hill group of men who sit around all season and then in March, they take the RPI ratings and the Conference Tourneys and let that wipe away the accomplishments of teams over the course of the year.

For teams like Mississippi St., Fresno St. and California, the bitter taste of three teams getting in from the Missouri Valley Conference, must taste especially bitter. With that being said we can begin concentrating on the teams that did make it in.

In the East bracket one can't help but look at the Duke Blue Devils, who have not only played in the toughest conference in the country (ACC), but have beaten arch rival North Carolina three times, pretty handily. You can expect them to win it all, and end up in their eighth final four in the last 15 years.

Tennessee had to be a surprise at the four spot in the East, as they look to be Dukes toughest opponent in the East till the great eight. Their loss to Mississippi St. should have knocked them down to a six seed at least.

On the other side of the East, off–and–on Temple could pose some threats for teams, but only if their not off the night they play Kent. Cincinnati and Miami, Fla. look to pose the biggest threats for the Dukies, but don't forget that Cincinnati's tournament record has been somewhat questionable, and that Miami doesn't really have a history despite being the No. 2 seed.

In the West, UConn was dealt the No. 1 seed and probably deserved to be No. 1 a little closer to home, but they will have to play in Denver

Feminist Steinem speaks at MHC

DAN MCCORMATT / COLLEGIAN

Renowned feminist Gloria Steinem makes a point during a panel discussion in celebration of International Women's Day at Mount Holyoke College last night.

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Touching on the timely subjects of affirmative action to the future of feminism to Barbie, four noted feminists discussed the institutional to the inspirational last night while fielding questions during a discussion at Mount Holyoke College.

"Life presents you with problems and opposition and also opportunities that you can't really control. The art of activism... is to understand that you can't control what happens," said Gloria Steinem, a 1993 inductee to the National Women's Hall of Fame, mover and shaker during the women's movement in the '70s and one of four editors on the panel of a new woman's history book. "[As for] tactics, I'm for anything that's off its ass."

Steinem was joined on the panel by three other women who co–edited The Reader's Companion to U.S. Women's History. The panel, which also included four students, was as diverse in background as the questions posed to them. The women questioned by the students on the panel and the audience in Chapin Auditorium, were Steinem, Dartmouth professor Maryse Navarro, Mount Holyoke alumnus and author Barbara Smith, and University of California professor and author Gwendolyn Mink.

The students on the panel wanted answers about diversifying the feminist movement that is typically made up of white middle class women.

"One of my disappointments [is] the black feminist [base] I have tried to build, it hasn't reached the mass number of women," Smith said.

"There are working class feminists who have been bringing these issues to the table," Mink said.

"What happens in this country is not isolated. There is a world of women... they have to develop different fronts [to fight for] different rights," Navarro said.

"It would be ideal for us to say we are women [and not look at racial and class differences] but that's not reality," said Ruth Lopez, a student panelist. "People are working for the same thing using different labels... It's important to see our struggles are different."

While examining the issue of diversity and affirmative action, Smith pointed out changes that have happened in her lifetime.

"There was no affirmative action when I was in college. [It] was almost completely segregated in Mount Holyoke then," Smith said. "Most white people in this country [won't deal] with anyone who is not white except for Michael Jordan."

Steinem said one way for the feminist and other movements to succeed is to initiate change, not just react to it. Also important, she said, is to understand the significance of "linkages" between events.

"The forces of events and backlash understand the linkages better than we do... We were unaware of linkages when the ultra–right wing was against birth control ,abortion and lesbianism," Steinem said to applause. "You can't fight the sexual caste system without also fighting the racial one. Our task, I think is to see the connections more clearly so we can ect together in our mutual self interest."

Steinem said a racial caste system for the ultra–right wing, provides a way to keep white women having purely white children and "women of color as reproducers of cheap labor."

Audience members fired a barrage of questions at the panel, some asking for guidance in creating unity, others questioning the effort to be politically correct by the panel.

"Politically correct is a term invented in the movement by all of us to make fun of ourselves. We do have a sense of humor, and it was picked up and used differently," Steinem said.

One student, noting the media attention given to the discussion, wanted to know how to make the media have a more realistic view of feminism.

Navarro was quick to answer, "reading," she said, reiterating a

RSO accused of violating SGA Constitution

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Allegations have been made against the Upside Down Club, a University of Massachusetts Registered Student Organization (RSO), for money laundering schemes, failure to establish a set quota of UMass undergraduate representation, and use of campus facilities and property under false pretense.

The Upside Down Club, in affiliation with the International Church of Christ, is being brought before the Student Government Association (SGA) Judiciary Court, headed by Attorney General Jesse Burchfield, to assess whether their actions and practices have violated the SGA Constitution. If they are found guilty of the charges brought before them, the club would be banned from operating on campus.

According to the SGA bylaws, it is required for any officer of an organization to act in the best interest of the student body foremost above any other organization. Burchfield says the club, and head organizer Aaron Dollar, have manipulated their access to campus membership for the sole improvement of the International Church of Christ.

Jesse Burchfield has been conducting investigative operations for the past three months to determine whether the Upside Down Club has violated the SGA's constitution. Burchfield is summoning the group to a SGA Judicial Court hearing on the grounds of acting as a forefront for a much larger organization.

"Their zealous recruitment tactics and total dedication to furthering the agenda of the International Church of Christ are evidence of their disregard of the student body's best interest and well–being," Burchfield said.

The SGA has already scheduled numerous meetings with the Upside Down Club to address the alleged issues, and the club itself has hired attorneys Michael Greco and Kimberly Schooley of the Boston law firm Hill and Barlow. Greco feels the SGA has not informed the group of the charges being brought before them.

"On behalf of the Upside Down Club, I have asked the attorney general of the SGA to provide specifics about the complaints leveled at the Upside Down Club," Greco said. "We've been provided with no specifics about these accusations."

"The Upside Down Club has been afforded every opportunity to meet with the SGA in regards to these allegations," Burchfield said. "Instead, they have chosen to hide behind their lawyers."

Numerous Upside Down Club members could not be reached and Aaron Dollar would not comment to the Collegian at press time.

Greco and his firm further deny the allegations made towards the group as to practicing what Dean of Students Merle Ryan recognized as a cult. Greco is disgusted at the administrative allegations made towards the group in regards to cult activity.

"I am very troubled that an administrator at the University of Massachusetts is making a statement that a student organization is a cult when that administrator has no evidence to support such a harmful accusation," Greco said.

Robert Lenz, a retired professor of polymer science, witnessed the effects of another cult on his son, and feels the same practices, used by the Upside Down Club, show that they're a cult and warrant such close scrutiny.

"From the fact that over 30 campuses across the country have banned [the International Church of Christ], that's a strong indication that UMass ought to be thinking about doing something," Lenz said.

The charges brought before the Upside Down Club include failure to comply with University facility and property guidelines and the indication they were granted this privilege in belief they were an independent RSO, which Burchfield believes they are not.

Other allegations include laundering money from prospective members into the International Church of Christ.

Ex–member and junior journalism major Joe Lastowski states such practices seemed quite common to the club.

"Basically, they recommend very strongly that members donate a substantial amount of their income as a religious tithe," Lastowski said.

Lastowski also cites most members of the group as being from the International Church of Christ, and in no way representing the student body of UMass.

A Judicial Court Hearing will be arranged prior to April 1, 1999.

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

In midcentury, when baseball stood above all American sports, Joe DiMaggio embodied what fans loved about the game. Fifty years later, he had lost little of his star quality.

"He was to people all over the world what a baseball player was supposed to be like," former Dodgers manager Tommy Lasorda said of DiMaggio, who died yesterday at age 84.

"If you said to God, 'Create someone who was what a baseball player should be,' God would have created Joe DiMaggio... And he did."

Added Tim McCarver, who spent two decades as a catcher and is now one of baseball's preeminent broadcasters: "The very mention of his name personifies class, dignity, elegance and professionalism, both on and off the field."

To those who knew him and to those who only admired him from afar, DiMaggio was the quintessential American hero.

"This son of Italian immigrants gave every American something to believe in," President Clinton said.

"He became the very symbol of American grace, power and skill... I have no doubt that when future generations look back at the best of America in the 20th century, they will think of the Yankee Clipper and all that he achieved."

Mark McGwire, himself a larger–than–life figure after hitting 70 home runs last season, said he was saddened by DiMaggio's death.

Auditions held for new student play examining Adam Prentice's death

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Auditions were held yesterday for a student–written play about the death of University of Massachusetts student Adam Prentice.

What Really Happened To Adam Prentice? explores the mysterious circumstances of Prentice's death. Prentice, an honors student, died of massive bleeding on Sept. 27, 1997, after falling through the roof of a campus greenhouse.

The play was written, and will be co–directed, by senior Valerie Lynch, a long–time friend of Prentice's.

"[The play] is basically a lot of information I've collected," says Lynch. "I've done interviews with people who really knew him, and there's a lot of evidence that's never been presented to the public — evidence the police wouldn't want displayed.

"A lot of people don't know what went on," she added. "And that's what's in my play — the other side of the story, so to speak."

After Prentice's death, many who knew him, including his mother, Barbara Prentice, criticized the police for concluding that his death was alcohol–related. His blood–alcohol level at the time of his death was .12 percent. The level of legal intoxication in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is .08 percent.

To this day, Barbara Prentice insists that her son was murdered, citing various discrepancies in the police investigation. Among these discrepancies is that police determined Prentice was alone, even though the first officer at the scene of his death reported that he believed a second person was still in the greenhouse.

Lynch agrees that the police were inept in their handling of the case, and asserts that Prentice's death had nothing to do with alcohol.

"The media portrayed it as an alcohol–related incident, which it wasn't," she said. "Everyone who knows him knows that wasn't the case. I believe that the way the case was handled, anyone on campus could have been portrayed in that light."

The play will run May 5–8 in the Curtain Theater, along with two other student–written and directed plays — Erin Pareigis' I Identify: What You See is What You Get, and Tim Matos' No Room for Error.

"Today someone asked me, 'Who is she to be writing about this?'" said the play's co–director, Derek DeMaio.

"I simply stated, 'A really good friend to him and his mother.' I don't think anybody would be better suited to write this."

Town of Amherst discusses Y2K plan

By Aimee Wallis
Collegian Correspondent

The talk of purchasing a generator for Bangs Community Center generated heated discussion last night at Amherst's Select Board meeting.

Town Manager Barry Del Castillho suggested purchasing a $60,000 generator or renting a generator for $32,000 per month. However, deadlines for obtaining either of these are fast approaching, steering town officials and residents to look at other options of shelter.

The idea of sending Amherst town residents to the dormitories at the University of Massachusetts was an idea brought up by Board Chairperson Hill Boss.

"Why move people into the high school when you already have ready–made dorms?" Boss asked.

The idea was quickly countered by Del Castillho who said, "I wouldn't recommend the dormitories as a good idea; students have their belongings in there over break."

Amherst town resident Larry Kelley suggested that members of the Select Board invest $10,000 into investigating UMass as a possible shelter sight in the year 2000. Kelley informed committee members that UMass owes the town of Amherst $25,000 and therefore UMass would not be losing any money with this investment.

"Perhaps UMass can be the host of our shelter," Boss said. Castillho has already planned on talking to the University. "More than one person will be looking at UMass to go to if power goes out on January 1," Castillo said.

"One thing we don't know is that it [the Y2K shutdown] could happen before the 20th century or halfway through the year," board member Eva Schiffer said.

Once a shelter place is established, no building will hold the community of Amherst, therefore the Select Board must determine who can stay in the shelter.

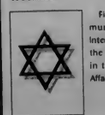
The handicapped and the elderly will be on the top of the list for obtaining a space in emergency shelters. However some of the handicapped, such as those that live in Clark House, will not be able to survive in a high school or community center for more than a day or two, said Amherst town residents.

This statement led to the suggestions of people taking care of themselves and not relying on the city to take care of them. People should attempt to stay in their homes, and facilities such as the Clark House should try to obtain a generator, said Schiffer said.

"Low–income should be included in the plan with handicapped," said Y2K citizen group member Dyan Wiley. Wiley was also frustrated with the lack of press coverage that the Select Board has received about their Y2K problems.

"The number of vulnerable people should be minimized, town hall needs to tell people about Y2K now, not November," says Wiley.

Dinah Kudatsky voiced concerns that she believed other Amherst town residents would have as well if they knew how extreme the problem was.



"I'm concerned about the loss of heat, I encourage those who own condominiums in such places as Pulfton Village to put in generators, I don't know what to do to stay alive, what are we all going to do?" says Kudatsky.

Accident victim still in critical condition

Allison Lustig, the University of Massachusetts student hit by a car last Wednesday, remains in critical condition at Bay State Medical Center in Springfield.

UMass Police Chief John Luippold said yesterday that the accident is still under investigation, and he was unable to release details about the incident. The Massachusetts State Police Re-Construction Team is assisting the UMass Police Department in the investigation.

No charges have yet been filed.

Police responded to a report of a pedestrian-motor vehicle accident at the intersection of Commonwealth and Governors Drive, near the William D. Mullins Center, at approximately 5 p.m. on March 3.

Lustig, 19, of Shrewsbury, was hit by a car operated by UMass student Kathryn Caserta, 21, of Waldwick, N.J. She was treated on the scene by the Amherst Fire Department and transported to Bay State Medical Center, where she remains in the intensive care unit, being treated for head injuries.

Students arrested for keg violations

Six University of Massachusetts students were arrested this weekend for hosting two keg parties on Hobart Lane Friday night.

Kevin Curley and Randall Cap-Renzi, both 20, were arrested on March 6 at 12:30 a.m. at 34 Hobart Lane, and charged with violating an Amherst noise ordinance, unlawful keg possession, and receiving stolen property (a highway safety barrel).

According to a report read by the prosecution, the Amherst Police Department responded to a noise complaint at 34 Hobart Lane at approximately 12:10 a.m. on March 6. There they discovered an illegal keg, which other party participants had attempted to conceal using a stolen highway barrel.

While at 34 Hobart Lane, the police also noticed loud noise and a "steady flow of young college-age people" holding yellow cups emerging from 36 Hobart Lane.

Patrick Johnson, 22; David Quatela, 21; Raymond Fleck, 19; and Nicholas Forelli, 20, were all arrested at 36 Hobart Lane and charged with violating the Town of Amherst noise ordinance and unlawful keg possession.

The four students stood together in Northampton District Court yesterday as they submitted to facts sufficient to warrant a guilty finding on both charges. Judge Rutberg ordered them to pay $300 in fines and $35 in court fees. Johnson, however, addressed Rutberg on behalf of the group and requested the judge waive the fine and enroll them instead in the UMass Residential Education Alcohol Program (REAP).

Rutberg agreed, then addressed the four using a basketball metaphor. "This [arrest] is like a foul in the first quarter," he said.

"My guess is that you don't want to have any convictions on your records" as you apply to graduate schools, he said. Unless the students are convicted of another crime within the next year, their records will remain clear. "Take this break and use it well."

Cap-Renzi and Curley were not given a break, however, due to records of previous involvement with the court. They were found guilty on all counts, fined a total of $400 per person, with an additional $35 in court fees. They were given the opportunity to pay the fees through community service work.

"You will be getting no more breaks from this court," Rutberg said. "If you want successful careers, stay out of court. It's easy... just not as fun. Good luck boys."

Administration calls for safety tips to be included on all food labels

By Janelle Carter
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration urged a federal panel yesterday to add food safety tips to the widely-used dietary guidelines, saying that after years of advising Americans on what to eat, it is time to teach them how to handle their food. "I believe the time has come to include food safety in the guidelines," said Catherine Woteki, the Agriculture Department's undersecretary for food safety. "Government has an obligation to help people protect themselves."

Woteki's comments came during a meeting of an advisory committee reviewing the "Dietary Guidelines for Americans." The guidelines, last altered in 1995, are reviewed every five years for changes. The panel will issue a report later this year with revisions for 2000.

The guidelines include advice such as choosing a diet with plenty of grain products, vegetables and fruits as well as eating a diet low in fat, saturated fat and cholesterol.

The guidelines have never included food safety information, but times and dangers have changed since the early 1980s when the guidelines began, Woteki said. She declined to recommend particular guidelines but said they might include advice on appropriate temperatures to store food or how to avoid mixing raw chicken with vegetables.

"Food safety is a critical factor in any discussion about diet and long-term health," Woteki said. "New pathogens have emerged just in the last decade."

Just in the last few months, consumers have witnessed numerous recalls of food products due to contamination with the bacteria, listera monocytogenes. A large recall in December by the Bil-Mar Foods plant in Zeeland, Mich., has even been linked to an outbreak that has resulted in at least 14 deaths, six miscarriages and 97 illnesses across the country.

Student charged after hacking into computer

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts computer science student was given one-year probation and 40 hours of community service for unlawfully accessing a female student's computer last semester and posting sexually explicit messages and pornographic material.

K-Lone Steele, 18, of Charlton, appeared in Northampton District Court last Thursday, where he submitted to facts sufficient to warrant a guilty finding on charges of annoying a person of the opposite sex and three counts of unauthorized use of a computer system.

According to the prosecution, Steele was able to remotely access the victim's computer from his room in Kennedy's Residence Hall by downloading and installing a program called "Trojan Horse."

In addition to 40 hours of community service, Judge M. John Schubert ordered Steele to write a letter of apology to the victim and complete a "sensitivity class."

The victim was present at Thursday's hearing, a decision she made because she "wanted to know who he was."

"He could have shown up at my door," she said. "It was making me paranoid... I didn't know."

In an interview after the trial, she explained exactly what happened and commented on the process leading to Steele's conviction.

"It started one night while I was in my room having a conversation with my friend when the CD-ROM drive opened," she said. "I closed the drive and a little while later it opened again and files started popping up."

She immediately turned off the computer, concerned that it was acting up as had other electrical devices in her room previously — her printer had broken the day before, and her VCR a week before that.

However, she soon realized the problem was more than just a case of an erratic computer and electrical wiring. The morning after Steele's initial access and harassment, she checked her e-mail and did not shut the computer off, leaving an away message instead for any friends trying to contact her.

During the day, one of her friends did try to contact her and was greeted with a slew of messages from Steele — "pretty raunchy stuff," she explained.

When she came home she also noticed Netscape was open and displaying a hacker's Web site. At this point she contacted the police, who informed her there was nothing they could do. She was told to contact them if anything further happened.

"It stopped a few days later for about two and a half to three weeks," she said. "But one day in December I came home to an incredibly graphic pornographic image. It was not funny anymore."

She was also receiving messages in "info boxes" saying things like, "a large penis has entered your komputer."

"I was really weirded out," she said. "It was making me nervous... and afraid to use my computer."

One Saturday morning she had an early exam. She turned on her computer monitor to find "the worst images." She was so upset she could not concentrate on the exam, she said. She contacted the police again. They in turn contacted Scott Conti from the Office of Information Technologies, and were able to put a trace on her system which identified Steele as the perpetrator.

"It was not somebody I knew, which bothered me even more," she said. "From what his attorney [Charles Maguire] told me, it was random — he just didn't stop. If it hadn't gotten past the CD-ROM and files, I wouldn't have been as upset. But he took it to a whole different level with the pornographic pictures, and I was feeling really harassed."

Police obtained a search warrant and seized computer equipment from Steele's room to be used as evidence. An examination of the equipment determined there was sufficient evidence to prove that Steele had accessed the victim's computer.

The equipment was returned to Steele, and the program that enabled him the access the victim's computer was destroyed.

Sitting behind Steele during the trial, the victim said that "he seemed really scared."

"He had very short answers for the judge," she said. "[At one point,] while sitting next to his attorney he said, 'Man, I really feel like an asshole.' He should."

She said she would have liked to see Steele receive a harsher penalty, or be charged with sexual harassment and invasion of privacy. She said she was also somewhat disappointed with OIT's involvement in the case.

"I've been told by so many people how easy it is for stuff like this to happen," she said. OIT said they would give her a program for her computer to prevent similar incidents from happening in the future. But they have failed to provide such a program, she said, and "seem to have stepped back [from the case] after their initial involvement."

"I think they really went easy on him," she said. But, she added, "I'm just really glad it's done."

Economists face off over new budget

By Martin Crutsinger
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A group of 100 prominent economists including six Nobel Prize winners came out yesterday in support of President Clinton's plan to use future surpluses to reduce the national debt, arguing it would add billions of dollars to economic growth in coming years.

But a separate group of conservative economists denounced Clinton's budget as "outrageous and misleading" and warned that the president is relying on the "mirage of a surplus" to escape making fundamental reforms to the Social Security program. The group of economists supporting the Clinton plan said that the president was right to dedicate the bulk of $4.4 trillion in projected surpluses over the next 15 years to reducing the $3.7 trillion in national debt held by the public.

Clinton touts his plan as shoring up the Social Security system — which he would accomplish by paying down the national debt, reducing interest payments on that debt and thus putting the government in better shape to meet the demands that will come when the baby boomers retire.

"This will free up trillions in the hands of private investors who will be able to lend the money to businesses for investment in new plant and equipment," said a statement from Economists for Increased National Savings.

The group said that cutting the amount of debt held by the public from the current 44 percent of the total economy down to 7 percent by 2014 would make more money available for businesses to borrow for productive investments.

Robert Solow, one of the Nobel winners who signed the statement, told reporters that this increased productivity could translate into overall economic growth that would be 0.2 percent to 0.3 percent higher annually, meaning an economy that would be 3 percent to 5 percent larger by 2015.

Solow said economists generally agree that one of the most important things the government can do to boost productivity is find ways to increase national savings. He said he and fellow Nobel winner James Tobin have been promoting such ideas since the early 1960s during the Kennedy administration.

"This is not a debate about liberal versus conservative policies, but a debate about reducing the national debt," said Alicia Munnell, a former member of Clinton's Council of Economic Advisers and now a professor at Boston University.

Both the Republicans in Congress and Clinton are pledging to use about two-thirds of coming surpluses to lower the national debt as a way of putting Social Security on a sounder financial footing for the retirement of baby boomers. But the two sides are widely split on exactly how to accomplish this and what to do with the remaining one-third of the surplus.

Separately, a group of conservative economists on Monday released a critical review of Clinton's budget, calling it an "outrageous and misleading document." The conservative economists questioned how Clinton could discuss surpluses at a time when Social Security was facing trillions of dollars in unfunded liabilities that will come due when baby boomers start retiring. "The mirage of a surplus ignores the entire unfunded liability for promises that the government has made to current and future Social Security recipients," the conservative economists said. Allan Meltzer, an economist at Carnegie Mellon University and chairman of the panel, said that it would make more sense to use any surpluses that do materialize to cut taxes in ways that would foster increased investment as a way of promoting higher economic growth.

The conservative group, known as the Shadow Open Market Committee, meets twice a year to critique federal economic policies and the handling of monetary affairs by the Federal Reserve. On the question of Fed policy, the group as it has for the past year said the central bank was failing to heed warning signs that the nation's money supply is growing too rapidly and thus sowing the seeds for future inflation.

An arresting argument

More police to lock up the criminals. Build more prisons. It will make our streets safer. These are two demands many voters ask of political candidates. The candidates often agree, especially those of the right-wing, that building more prisons and locking more people up longer will create a safer environment for American citizens.

Sunday's New York Times revealed that government crime statistics will be announced later this month. The statistics will show that the crime rate has dropped significantly in the past six years. Also, they will reveal that the number of prisoners has boomed even more.

Jason Weisenbach

It seems, then, that the two stances on crime that both voters and politicians seem so passionate about supporting have succeeded. We have now locked up one out of every 150 Americans. No other industrialized nation comes even close to this incarceration rate.

The theory behind locking up more criminals and keeping them locked up for longer periods is that crime itself will level off, and then drop. This will then lead to fewer crimes being committed because criminals are off the streets. On the immediate surface, according to the recent statistics, politicians and voters should be very satisfied.

The politicians, of course, will never reveal the dilemmas that these supposed victories have created, though. First, the cost of housing these criminals has increasingly entered into a larger part of federal, state and local budgets.

To arrest more people, you first have to have more salaried police. Then, to convict, you have court costs. To house them after conviction, you spend about $20,000 a year per inmate. Therefore, because budgets allot for only so much money, the costs of supposed safer streets has come at the expense of other social programs, such as education.

The main reason for the inmate explosion is the "war on drugs" that began with the Reagan administration after 1980. Almost 60 percent of current federal inmates were convicted on a drug-related crime. Combine increased police focus on drugs with mandatory sentences for many possession and selling crimes, and hence the overcrowded prisons.

But, you say, if crime is falling, then isn't it worth it to society, especially children, that less crimes are committed? However, is it really true that crimes are down? To really analyze crime statistics, one must separate crimes by category.

The biggest contradiction in the government heralding a six-year crime-rate drop is that the statistics themselves are flawed. Violent crimes, such as murder and assault, as well as robbery, have accounted for the biggest drops in crime rates. However, arrests for drug use are at an all-time high. It seems, then, that no matter how much police enforcement is used and drug users are incarcerated, drug use continues.

In the FBI crime index, however, drug convictions are not included. In fact, drug use has not risen or declined in the past 10 years. And within this, drug use for the younger population has increased. Thus, increasing penalties and arresting more for drug use neither lowers use rates, nor deters the young from experimenting and continuing use.

How can one say, then, that crime has gone down if the FBI does not include the largest portion of convictions in its statistics? Such tactics by the government make me skeptical of its crime statistics, especially the drug use ones.

It also makes me question the methods and treatments this country uses against drug use, for it seems to want to hide the drug use increase. The United States is the most active propaganda machine against recreational narcotic use, yet has by far the largest heroin problem of any Western nation.

States across the country, despite politicians' calls for more police and long sentences, have noticed that heavily focusing on drug crimes has created prison overcrowding.

Some leaders and states have also noticed that increased sentencing is not a deterrent. The state of Washington has considered dropping mandatory sentencing, and Massachusetts has recently considered major reforms. Also, California has stopped building new prisons.

The continued use of drugs, in spite of heavy enforcement, makes me wonder about the role of drugs in our culture. Could use really be lowered to a minimum? Or, does society really want drug use to be stopped to begin with?

Finally, the manipulation of the crime index to subvert the drug conviction rate makes me question any crime statistics. Has the government simply cherry-picked them to make it seem that violent crimes and robberies have decreased?

Personally, I would suspect that in an economy so robust as ours, one should expect a decrease in violent crimes, because the overall stress for individuals is much lower than it would be in a recession with high unemployment.

With drug use rates unaffected by the "war on drugs," America needs to rethink its position on the penalties, and whether society, instead of benefitting, is suffering because of social program cuts. Also, the increased police presence brings an unavoidable feeling of fading personal freedom and privacy, whether or not one supports the war on drugs.

The government needs to reveal the real truth to Americans, that the "war on drugs" has failed, and that the supposed successes in other areas of crime are perhaps due to the positive fluctuation in the economy currently.

Letter to the "white" community

During his state of the union speech, President Clinton stated, "We have finally opened the doors of college to all Americans." If we juxtapose this statement with the discourse surrounding the current arguments about affirmative action, we can see how blanket statements, which use the word "all," create an argument that has very little room for critique.

How can you argue with a statement that says "all people should be able to attend college regardless if they are white, black, brown, queer, poor or have kids?" You cannot because all people should be able to attend college regardless of race, class, gender, ethnicity or sexuality.

What does it mean to make a statement which says "and justice for all" or "individual dignity... is the birthright of all Americans?" What happens if we put these statements into a historical context?

What happens if we define racism, not just as being prejudice towards someone because of the color of their skin, but as "a historical stratification process by which the population of European descent... has been able to intentionally sustain, in its own best advantage, the dynamic mechanism of upward and downward mobility or fluid class status over the non-European populations using skin color, gender, class, ethnicity or non-western nationality as the main criteria for enforcing differential resource allocation decisions that contribute to decisive changes in class status."

To say that someone can be a "reverse racist" is absurd when we think critically on what racism means. How can a person of color be racist to a "white" person if he has no socio-political power backing his speech? What is the difference between racism, bigotry, and prejudice? How can the idea of affirmative action be "racist in nature" when we look at the construction of race historically?

In order to say that "those who make it, make it, and those who aren't well prepared, don't," you need to make an historical, non-critical analysis of the practice of race in the United States. In order to be against affirmative action, you have to believe in a racial equality that does not exist.

The subject of merit is insidiously confusing. When has individual merit ever been the basis for success or failure in the United States? The federal government has historically played a major role in restricted resource allocation to communities of color. After World War II, the Federal Housing Authority systematically denied housing loans to "blacks" which aided in the racial segregation of U.S. residential neighborhoods. Also, the General Service Administration (GSA) intentionally "channeled money from the government's own rental and leasing business to realtors who engaged in racial discrimination," while simultaneously initiating "slum clearance programs" to destroy housing in poor urban neighborhoods.

There are just too many examples to list. Merit cannot be defined outside of historical practices that allow the upward mobility of some at the expense of others.

Even whites have been systematically excluded from Ivy League schools regardless of their "individual merit." In the 1950s, Harvard had a system (it might still be in effect) which allowed admissions priority to the children of alumni over non-alumni regardless of individual academic achievement.

How do you define merit anyhow: SATs, GREs, GPA, or the life experience of a non-traditional student? How about a single parent handling job, child, work and school — doesn't that deserve merit?

There is already research which proves that SAT scores do not reflect the intelligence or academic quality of an individual. We need to shatter the myth of meritocracy which states "GPA+SAT = MIT." Research has shown that SAT scores correlate more with zip code and economic status than how bright and individual is.

If we recognize historical biases in the requirements to get into college, then how can we say "if someone can't speak with decent grammar [what is that?], do well on SATs, and earn the GPA required for entrance into a college, then he or she shouldn't be allowed in?". The only way to justify a statement like that is to accept that there is an equal playing field, and that 500 years of systematic oppression has no bearing on an individuals chance of upward mobility and fluid class status.

"That is the liberal agenda — to want social change but not be willing to risk anything to achieve it."

Jon Zibbell

On the notion of discrimination: Is affirmative action a form of discrimination against the "white" community? The answer to that question is undeniably, "yes!" But isn't it a form of discrimination that is completely rational and just, for the same reasons that past discrimination was socially accepted?

After World War II, we discriminated against civilians by giving veterans extra points on civil service examination and free tuition for college. We discriminate on behalf of poor people when we give them, and them alone, food stamps. We discriminate on behalf of manufactures when we set tariffs against foreign goods, and on behalf of corporations when they get enormous subsidies from the government.

These are all forms of affirmative action, and "once they are pointed out to people, the similarity is irrefutable.

Both communities — ALANA and non-ALANA — are divided along class, ethnicity, gender, and sexuality lines and there is also a history of discrimination against poor whites similar to the restricted resource allocation of ALANA populations. We should be recruiting and financially aiding low-income students and ALANA students, but not one at the expense of the other. By subsuming race under class in admissions criteria is reproducing a long history of pitting poor whites against people of color.

What about the common question, "I did not have anything to do with the historical oppression of people of color, so why do I need to apologize, feel guilty or take responsibility for past injustices?" The answer to that question is, you don't. I do not believe that "white guilt" or just acknowledging that facts mentioned above will change anything.

We are not responsible for these past injustices, but once we become aware of them we have the responsibility to do something about it. We cannot simultaneously resist compulsory white privilege and not be willing to give anything up. That is the liberal agenda — to want social change but not be willing to risk anything to achieve it.

Whites have benefited from the differential resource allocation that legitimizes their position within the discourse of merit, individualism, and "respect for truth." There is no need for guilt or an apology from the white community, but a conscious admission of the privilege that historically has been awarded to "whites" along with a form of action to dismantle institutionalized racism and compulsory white privilege.

Johnny Five alive!

"Wool Spring break!"

If I had a nickel for everytime that gorgeous phrase has slipped past my lips. Well, I'd still be poor. But who's counting?

Spring break is less than a week away. My last official spring break. And maybe, just maybe, I'll break my string of 22 consecutive spring breaks in sunny Oreland, Pa. Maybe I can go just this time without hearing the phrase "That lawn ain't mowin' itself, lawn-boy."

I've got this weird feeling, and it might just be the clam chowder I had, but this is different. For one thing, my palms aren't sweaty. For another thing, I don't have to lie my head down on the desk every five minutes.

Mike Messaros

So it's either love or Spring Break Fever! (Scientific name: streptococcus jimbackus.) And I don't think it's love because I don't enjoy sunsets any more than usual.

I checked the only reliable source for these things: my horoscope. The stars have been quoted as saying that "If you rely on certain things, then certain actions will one day occur. Keep abreast of certain situations."

Sweet.

It's like they know me.

I am prepared to "get jiggy with it," to use the common phrase among the young folk. (But of course, the young folk today seem to enjoy big pants, Marilyn Manson, hashish and grand theft auto. I'll tell you, I don't understand these bold kids.)

And I know I'm ready for spring break after seeing Chancellor Scott emerging from the WMUA radio station after that scintillating interview on Sunday morning (otherwise known as "the Sabbath") wearing a suit and... white sneakers? "Jiminy Crickets," I said to myself, "I must be seeing things. That's the man in charge of my tuition and he's wearing Keds."

It could be very healthy for me to get away from this University during such trying economic and fashion times. And the farther away I get, the less likely it'll be that I'll hear a certain cloying Scottish voice talking about things like "athletic intelligence" (what?), affirmative action and the need to cut faculty.

Because we all know that a major university cannot support athletic facilities, a physical plant, 10,000 RSOs, the Whitmore snack bar, an opium den (oops, did I let the cat out of the bag?) and a humanities department (such trivial things like that... how do we expect to move into the 21st century reading books?). Unless, of course, that university is Penn State. Or the University of North Carolina. Or any other major university that has it's crap together.

So I think we're heading in one direction: cyborgs.

Hear me out: Cyborgs are efficient, loyal, cheap and don't know how to protest. But, oh, do they know how to party.

One thing that the chancellor will have to worry about with these cyborgs, besides the Y2K bug, is the fact that they could catch Spring Break Fever!

I mean, cyborgs have to go on spring break too. And if Chancellor Scott knows anything about cyborgs (and I've got a feeling that he does, although he doesn't seem to know not to wear white sneakers and a suit — Come on. How can a man run a major university if he can't run his wardrobe?) he should watch out for this. And if he's thinking about having classes taught by supersmart dinosaurs? Bad idea. Jurassic Park should have taught us all a lesson. I know I learned something.

In between all this faculty-cutting talk, the apparent need for "new technology," all the money being funnelled into engineering and sciences, and this new "computer lab" being built near Lederle, I can only think that this points to cyborgs.

There are two things I know: I loved Johnny Five in Short Circuit (although technically not a cyborg, he was still cute as the dickens) and cyborgs don't need money. The University can then pump its money into grander schemes, like more snack bars, cooler slogans, bringing more R-rated hypnotists to campus, more athletic scholarships for losing teams (tell me the basketball team wouldn't have been better with that hot skunk from Space Jam), and studies that investigate, once and for all, "athletic intelligence."

And I know about saving money. I'm saving money by living in my parents' basement after college. To save for graduate school, you may ask? No — to save for a pinball machine.

But I was talking about spring break. Yeah, I'll be on that plane to wherever, and I'll look down at UMass and I'll think "Man, everyone looks like an ant!"

Even the cyborgs... Even the cyborgs.

Letters to the Editor

GSS responds to chancellor's e-mail

To the editor:

After reading Chancellor Scott's e-mail to the UMass community, the Executive Committee of the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) felt compelled to respond.

It is common knowledge that under the direction of his office, Chancellor Scott announced the de facto dismantling of affirmative action on the Amherst campus two weeks ago. The e-mail statement is merely an attempt at damage control after a bold and vicious attack on affirmative action admissions policies throughout the UMass system.

We think it is wonderful that President Bulger and his trustees "fully embrace" the goal of maintaining diverse campus communities across the Commonwealth. However, it has been predicted that the order to delete affirmative action from our admissions policy will result in a 9 to 10 percent decline in ALANA student admittance to our University. How is this an embrace of diversity?

The response to our inquiry is predictable. Bulger will refer to the recent Boston Latin court decision, the anti-affirmative action climate that has swept our nation and its court system, and the ultimate legal impracticality of continuing the (now former) admissions policies.

Lacking a clear public, political or legal mandate on the issue, their isolated interpretation of the matter has led to the dismantling of affirmative action in UMass Amherst's admissions policies. If President Bulger or the trustees did truly embrace the goal of diversity they would be willing to fight for the policies that have (albeit moderately) increased the diversity of the student body.

Many on our campus and across the Commonwealth have welcomed and supported this fight. President Bulger's actions are cowardly, hypocritical, and ultimately, racist.

In the rather confusing last paragraph of the e-mail, Bulger seems to intimate that admissions policies implemented by UMass campuses in the past have resulted in the admission of unqualified students unprepared for "university-level work." We are concerned that, in short, President Bulger is promulgating and legitimizing a destructive and wholly incorrect assumption about affirmative action — that is, that the use of affirmative action in admissions allows students of a lesser caliber to enter.

Not only is this insulting and shockingly racist, but it is simply not true. The ALANA students on this campus and across the state have earned their grades and have earned their rightful place in this institution of public learning: higher education. For President Bulger to hint otherwise speaks volumes over his two-paragraph statement.

Interfaith Actions begins community service work

By Renee Cohn
Collegian Staff

Connecting through community service, a group of students have come together to form Interfaith Actions, an organization working to help fight poverty while learning and working with people of different faiths.

Sarah Shapiro, who has been involved with Interfaith Actions from the start, said she was attracted to it because of its "open-minded perspectives."

"It's a way to branch out and bring many different people together for one important cause," Shapiro said.

The group began this year with the goal of creating informative and community-oriented programs for the future.

Beginning last semester with a weekend trip to New York City, the group participated in various forms of community service, including working at food banks, soup kitchens and participating in a "midnight run" to pass out food to the homeless on the streets of Manhattan. The rest of the weekend included attending services at St. John's Cathedral, visiting an Islamic cultural center and building a sukkah (literally, a booth) for the Jewish holiday of Sukkot.

David Arfa, program director at Hillel and a co-sponsor of the group, said that it was "the community service in an interfaith group that drew the students in."

In addition, the group members recently toured a food bank to learn more about hunger and homelessness.

The local food bank that covers all surrounding locations gives food and supplies to organizations such as schools, survival centers, nursing homes and shelters where at least 50 percent of the recipients are on welfare, poverty or in need.

Much of the food bank's supply comes from places like Stop & Shop, and donations from community and volunteer groups. Interfaith Actions is making an effort to find out more about hunger, and what students at UMass can do to help.

The group is hoping to bring the concepts of food problems and solutions to the University. They are looking into finding ways to donate unused food from the Dining Commons as well as possibly starting a soup kitchen or shelter on campus.

Shapiro is optimistic about the future endeavors of the group.

"The project is extending and becoming more local," Shapiro said. "Although we may go to New York again, a lot of our current focus is on projects in our area."

A three-credit class will be designed in which students will develop a proposal for the on-campus shelter and do research on needed resources.

In addition, the group is hosting informational sessions on the topic of homelessness. Last week, a speaker addressed students on the relationship between community service, social justice, hunger and poverty.

Currently, the group is sponsored by Hillel, the Ark Episcopal Chapel and the United Christian Society.

Interfaith dating: yes or no?

Wanted: One single, spiritual being for intelligent conversation. Must have keen sense of humor and various odd quirks which others may find unattractive. Possible interest in committed relationship. Send resume and cover letter. No non-Jews need apply

I believe that every relationship should begin with an audition. The potential significant other would submit a resume including recommendations from former partners. There would be a chronology of how the relationship began, why it ended and any necessary information in between. Like whether or not they consider Shabbat services an excellent date activity.

I must take this opportunity to disclose something I have not always been an observant Jew. I was definitely the kid who had to be cajoled into going to Sunday school and was more than a little jealous of the kids who got Santa Claus. Instead of Chanukah Harry, the existence of whom no one could prove. Three years ago, however, I decided to recommit myself to Judaism.

"Wonderful!" my family said when I decided to make aliyah. My non-Jewish friends asked me questions I was excited to answer. ("Why can't you eat that?") My Jewish friends invited me to services with them and I became more active in Hillel. I was ecstatic about learning and observing, and I wanted to know more.

Then I made The Decision: I would not be dating any more non-Jewish men. I wanted to marry someone Jewish, to have Jewish children and to have a ketubah hanging on the wall. I wanted an enormous Passover seder every year and enormous naming ceremonies for my children.

Chanel Dubofsky is a Collegian columnist.

The wind suddenly changed. It was alright to be observant, terrific to fast on Yom Kippur, fantastic to get up on my soap box about what was wrong with Jewish education in America, but it was never, ever alright to say I wouldn't date non-Jews.

I am excited by the prospect of someone who will not only share Shabbat with me, but who will understand the liturgy and appreciate it. I want someone who will stand on the bimah with me when our children become bar- or bat- mitzvahed, and reminisce of his own important day, and share his pride with me. I believe that a common bond like this will not only strengthen our marriage, but also our children's positive Jewish identity.

Chanel Dubofsky

Not to mention that there is something about a man in a kippah...)

My choice is an individual one, and I feel strongly that I should not be made to feel isolated from people because of it. I have made the choice to be part of the chain of Jewish continuity, and I feel empowered by that. Judaism is an integral part of my life, and a deeply gratifying part of who I am as a person.

For this reason, I feel I should not be called on to defend my decision. "You are so shallow!" people say when I tell them my preference. I have been accused of being both xenophobic and racist. I prefer to think of myself as neither. I am a Jew committed to the principle of Jewish continuity. I am a human being moved by the sound of my own name, and I believe that it lies within someone who will not only understand, but compliment my religious and cultural identity.

Water in reserve

The Nahal Hermon Reserve, situated between the northern part of the Golan Heights and Mount Hermon inside Israel, provides 50 percent of Israel's water.

The path of action

In my last column, I discussed basic issues of Jewish thought, including God, performance of mitzvot (commandments) and Torah study. To briefly sum it up, I stated that God is genderless, and that gender-related names are a means of categorizing divine energies in a way which humans can understand. I also related that both the spiritual and physical realms are expressions of Godliness.

Based on that idea, we understood that each individual is a part of God, one with God in a way similar to an organ's relationship to the rest of the body. Therefore, by doing mitzvot, we perform a unique task in which we simultaneously add to and receive from God's infinite being (as an organ performs a task, maintaining the body, which in turn maintains the organ). Working on this foundation, in this column I would like to expand on the idea of mitzvot.

Hayyim Rothman

As much as contemplation, true spirituality is also about action, about physicality. Throughout the world, in holy book after holy book, we read that God or enlightenment or any other means of describing the ultimate is far from us. To become one with this energy, we must transcend ourselves go beyond this world, beyond our being. There is a place for this in Judaism, but the twist is that any transcendence of self must ultimately be brought back to the self. The focus is this world. Thus, the Lubavitcher Rebbe said, "We must bring the Heaven down to the Earth."

Our world is not an illusion, neither is it a place whose essence is irredeemably sinful and thus worthless. It is very real and very holy. Because we humans have free will, we do have the power to abuse the opportunities we have in life, to hurt each other and make war. Yet this is no reason either to cover our eyes with our hands and claim it does not exist, nor is it reason to condemn it to eternal damnation and crusade our way to heaven.

What we do find reason for is to understand that this too is of God because everything is of God for God is infinite. What this means is that the tools of enlightenment are not beyond us, but within us and we have a responsibility to wield them wisely. God is present in all places in all things and at all times, thus all of these can be utilized as a means of connecting to God. In this way, we achieve true "enlightenment," because the enlightenment is not beyond us, but through us (and so we can become one with it, not perceive it from afar).

Here we realize that true transcendence is not about leaving one state to perceive another, but that there is a continuity, an oneness; we understand that each place is all places because the source of all places is the Eternal. Therefore, even shopping for food can be a transcendent act because infinity manifests equally in everything, and so all of existence and that which is beyond existence is present in each moment of one's life.

The concept above, in the context of our topic (mitzvot), is meant to show that this physical world is a conduit for spirituality, that it can be used; that to banish God and spirituality to "higher" or "more elevated" realms exclusively, is just falsehood.

To continue the topic, I return to the allegory of the human body. The DNA which biologically defines us is present equally in all cells of the body (with the exception of sex cells). This is how we can characterize the idea related in the previous paragraph.

Simultaneously, we have diversified organs, composed of the same genetic material, but exhibiting individual, diverse facets of the universal genetic information. It is only through this diversification that the genetic material reaches its full potential, and at the same time these diversifications are composed of and completely dependent upon the genetic blueprint (the information exists in both universal oneness and in diversity).

So too, God's essential oneness is infinite, equally present in everything, while at the same time, this oneness is expressed through various spiritual and physical mediums.

It is in this way not only that human life has meaning, but that specific actions within that life can have different meanings and purposes. Now we can approach mitzvot. Assuming that the role truth lies in an undifferentiated oneness, we can claim that any action creates an unequal unification between mankind and God. Then mitzvot have no relevance. Yet this is not the case. As we understand through the analogy of DNA and diversified organs, "absolute oneness" "diversifies" because it is through diversification that the oneness is given full expression.

At the same time, both exist as one. Specific actions express diverse aspects of the one God. Building on this idea, when God "expresses" to us in some way that we should conduct ourselves in exact ritual, ethical or social manners; it is not an irrelevant or antiquated demand, but rather a window to the ultimate.

When we perform these actions we are making ourselves into "organs of the Divine," so to speak, taking a potential in the "Divine DNA" and bringing it to its full expression in an actual characteristic. Through the above, we achieve true spiritual experience, by utilizing our human faculties of thought, speech and action in mitzvot unite ourselves with the Infinite by expressing a latent potential and thus becoming it in fruition. These actions bridge the gap between infinite and finite, All and One, "bringing the Heaven down to Earth."

The truth, the paths we all must find and walk, are not far, they are lying inside of us; stop for a moment and realize that equally in everything, and so all of existence and that which is beyond existence is present in each moment of one's life.

The concept above, in the context of our topic (mitzvot), is meant to show that this physical world is a conduit for spirituality, that it can be used; that to banish God and spirituality to "higher" or "more elevated" realms exclusively, is just falsehood.

To continue the topic, I return to the allegory of the human body. The DNA which biologically defines us is present equally in all cells of the body (with the exception of sex cells). This is how we can characterize the idea related in the previous paragraph.

Simultaneously, we have diversified organs, composed of the same genetic material, but exhibiting individual, diverse facets of the universal genetic information. It is only through this diversification that the genetic material reaches its full potential, and at the same time these diversifications are composed of and completely dependent upon the genetic blueprint (the information exists in both universal oneness and in diversity).

So too, God's essential oneness is infinite, equally present in everything, while at the same time, this oneness is expressed through various spiritual and physical mediums.

It is in this way not only that human life has meaning, but that specific actions within that life can have different meanings and purposes. Now we can approach mitzvot. Assuming that the role truth lies in an undifferentiated oneness, we can claim that any action creates an unequal unification between mankind and God. Then mitzvot have no relevance. Yet this is not the case. As we understand through the analogy of DNA and diversified organs, "absolute oneness" "diversifies" because it is through diversification that the oneness is given full expression.

At the same time, both exist as one. Specific actions express diverse aspects of the one God. Building on this idea, when God "expresses" to us in some way that we should conduct ourselves in exact ritual, ethical or social manners; it is not an irrelevant or antiquated demand, but rather a window to the ultimate.

When we perform these actions we are making ourselves into "organs of the Divine," so to speak, taking a potential in the "Divine DNA" and bringing it to its full expression in an actual characteristic. Through the above, we achieve true spiritual experience, by utilizing our human faculties of thought, speech and action in mitzvot unite ourselves with the Infinite by expressing a latent potential and thus becoming it in fruition. These actions bridge the gap between infinite and finite, All and One, "bringing the Heaven down to Earth."

The truth, the paths we all must find and walk, are not far, they are lying inside of us; stop for a moment and realize that equally in everything, and so all of existence and that which is beyond existence is present in each moment of one's life.

The concept above, in the context of our topic (mitzvot), is meant to show that this physical world is a conduit for spiritu-

My so–called Jewish life

Sometimes Jewish, Jewish, Jewish all day long is just too much for me. To wake up with the Torah service as the song running through my head, to work with other Jewish people and to eat Kosher food, all in one day, sometimes just knocks me over.

Elana Premack

Sometimes I'd love to wake up thinking, "Come on, Eileen" instead of "Shema Yisrael" and to talk during the day about something other than Israel with people eating cheeseburgers. Dealing with the overlap of Jewish culture and religion is a daily struggle, not easily tempered when you're someone who is about as "out" with her Judaism as she can get.

The discomfort surrounding the unbreakable link between Jewish culture and religion strikes me at strange times, and usually hits hardest just when I don't need it the most. Like when I'm sitting in Shabbat services. All weekend long. Or when I realize that I've spent my entire weekend with my Jewish friends. It's not so much a discomfort with the situation (I really had a wonderful, relaxing weekend, most likely thanks to the peace of Shabbat services and the comfort of friends) as it is with my recent development as a Jew. It was never that hard for me to be Jewish — I'm just realizing that it's gotten hard for me to be just a little bit Jewish.

Over the past two years, my Judaism seems to have become an all–or–nothing deal. I wish I didn't get so much out of Shabbat services. I wish I didn't leave feeling like I can't wait to go back. I don't go around thinking "chosen people, chosen people," but there is something special about having Jewish friends.

Jewish Affairs has become an outlet for my writing, just as Jewish Residential Area Programming has become an outlet for my development as a leader and as a person.

In some ways, it's a privilege to be Jewish, if only for the immediate connection to other Jews. In other ways, that connection ("Oh, you're Jewish too?") is the dark underbelly of the culture which is Judaism.

There are points in time when my Judaism takes me over like the ice that was spraying and swirling this past weekend, its iridescence attacking the helpless trees. Times like when I sit with my forehead wrinkled, trying to make sense of 19 years of submission and silence regarding an often patriarchal religion. Or when following along in a prayer book which opens backwards doesn't suit me; when realizing that dancing or shouting or even singing in unison doesn't work either. Or when I feel as if I don't have a choice about the effect my Judaism has on my entire life.

It has become me. I have become it. The first two words of this column are "Sometimes Jewish." For me, the idea of being sometimes Jewish seems impossible.

I can't just turn my Judaism on and off like it's connected to a light switch. There exists a history of me being Jewish, as well as a history of a lot of other people being Jewish, which shapes me. Add to this history the little pieces of Jewish culture: the Friday to Saturday sabbath, ritual candlelightings and Hebrew language; along with the stereotypes: nice Jewish girl, Jewish American Princess and Jewish mother; and I feel like Atlas, carrying the weight of the Jewish world on my shoulders. It gets heavy.

> "There are points in time when my Judaism takes me over like the ice that was spraying and swirling this past weekend, its iridescence attacking the helpless trees."

As I have filled my life with more Jewishness, I have developed a new consciousness. It's not quite the double consciousness of race, but closer to the realizations I have about myself when quickly walking by a mirror or a pane of glass. I'll catch a glimpse of my true self, the self that other people see when I walk quickly by them, the self that isn't sculpted by years of looking intently into a mirror and deciding, "Yes, this is what I look like."

My consciousness of my Judaism is this consciousness of truth. I am always that image in the pane of glass; it is my truth. In much the same way, Judaism is my truth. I am always, inescapably but acceptably, Jewish.

Black Crowes latest album doesn't have any soul

COURTESY AMERICAN RECORDINGS

Southern rockers Black Crowes fake the funk on their hopelessly mediocre new release By Your Side.

By Ben Millar
Collegian Correspondent

BY YOUR SIDE
The Black Crowes
Columbia Records

This Southern-fried boogie bluesy rocky thing the Black Crowes do is old. Hence, they should either be really good at it, or try something else, but this quagmire of an album finds them doing neither. It lacks subtlety. It lacks power. It lacks class.

Basically, it lacks. To top it off they are looking like Aerosmith on cheap crack — yet don't take enough drugs to use that as an excuse.

The Black Crowes are spiralling down the staircase reserved for those cursed with the 'over-successful debut blues.' Their pyrotechnic entrance in 1990 with Shake Your Moneymaker furnished their collective psyches with a fatal overestimation of their own importance.

The hairy-palmed critics can afford to be nice. You are being asked for cold hard cash. As such, take time to ask yourself what this album does that hasn't been done to death before; how it will improve your life; how far the world has moved on since Mick Jagger fathered his first illegitimate.

The first taste of By Your Side is the easy to forget "Go Faster." It does not bode well. The rust-flaked harmonica sits nicely over that Chris Robinson groinal welp. The problems begin with some lame backing vocals, just one example of too many "embellishments" this over-produced little slab of plastic could have scrubbed away.

The odd glimmer of hope such as "Horsehead," which grunts and swivels and gets appropriately down and dirty, ultimately stands as the exception which prove the rule.

Granted, the boys have got rhythm. The voice 'aint bad. That guitar is kinda sexy. But a couple of hot licks does not an eargasm make. This album has more focus than its shambling predecessors, but this too proves detrimental. The greasy raggedness of old was always their shtick, without that they are on the verge of sounding like what they are — white boys trying to fabricate soul.

The New York Post suggests "What a disc like this proves is that a sound this good can never go out of style." Bollocks. Style is a morpheus creature nobody has dibs on, it can only exist by virtue of leaving everything behind. Primal Scream moved on from their unhealthy Rolling Stones fetish and found validation, maybe it is time the Black Crowes were left behind for a while. At least until '80's retro comes around, they can pass themselves off as a reasonably adequate Black Crowes cover band.

Ed Wood sparkles with Burton's twisted genius

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

ED WOOD
Directed by Tim Burton with Johnny Depp, Martin Landau, Sarah Jessica Parker

When twisted genius Tim Burton's work comes to mind, one often thinks Pee-Wee's Big Adventure, Beetlejuice and Batman. The film that is often overlooked is his tribute to one of his idols: the man widely regarded as the "worst director of all time," Edward D. Wood, Jr.

Due to Burton's demented vision, bravura performances from all actors involved, and a clever script, Ed Wood rivals Beetlejuice and Batman Returns as Tim Burton's masterpiece.

The film tells the story of Ed Wood's (Johnny Depp) days as a down-and-out, would-be filmmaker in Hollywood. Starting off as a theater director, Wood was never a filmmaker to let lack of funding, scathing reviews or second takes get in the way of making his godawful movies. Discovering that a B-movie producer was looking for a director to helm a sex-change flick, Wood scammed his way into the position by telling the producer that: a) he can get Bela Lugosi to star in it because a "hero of my friends" and b) "I like to wear women's clothing."

Although he was lying to the producer that he would make a good film, he was telling the truth about both of the aforementioned qualifications. He met Bela Lugosi (Martin Landau) while buying coffins at a Beverly Hills mortuary and the two almost immediately forged a friendship, and Wood's cross-dressing was kept secret from his then girlfriend, actress Deloren Fuller (Sarah Jessica Parker).

He used the situation as the basis for his film that would become Glen or Glenda? The movie chronicles the making of Wood's first three films, Glen or Glenda?, Bride of the Monster, and winner of the "Golden Turkey Award" as the worst movie of all time, Plan 9 From Outer Space.

Johnny Depp as of late has shed his teen heart-throb status he earned on "21 Jump Street," with films like

Something for the hip-hop vinyl vultures

David Katzoff

The underworld culture of rap music is pulsating with raw material both rare and common to the average crate digger. A variety of independent, White Label and bootlegged vinyl has begun to emerge from the depths of numerous global sources, eliciting a plethora of ear candy for the 1200s.

From the indie underground comes Peanut Butter Wolf's triple LP My Vinyl Weighs a Ton, released on Copesetik records. This elaborate posse collaboration features various emcees such as Vin Roc, Rhettmatic, Rasco and Prince Paul, plus old-school beat jockeys like Q-Bert, A-Track, Babu, Rob Swift and Hands.

Black Attack returns to the 12" with "Rep Da R.I." backed by production from their label executive DJ Honda.

Another blazing track is "Skeme Team" by Punkinhead with Word-A-Mouth coupled with a gripping beat and fierce, tumbling lyrics by Word.

From the Rawkus clan comes a fascinating collaboration import via the UK called New York State of Rhyme featuring the vocal wisdom of El Da Sensi, Punch & Wurds, Hi & the Mighty, Talib Kweli, Shabaam Sahdeeq, Consequence and true school legend Craig G.

Also, definitely check out the fizzm EP Hieroglyphe Volume 1, 7 eight-song premier for the Memphis label with tracks by Jurrassic 5, Dialated Peoples and Blak Forest.

From the sacred realms of the White Label, surfaces several tantalizing releases. Foremost, is the brand new Pharcyde EP entitled Testing the Waters. Although it was exclusively released overseas, collectors can locate limited copies from selected domestic sources.

In addition to producing new joints for Freddie Foxxx, Nas, D'Angelo and Charli Baltimore, DJ Premier has dropped his second Unreleased Beats album, which is a vocal-less compilation of treasured Works of Mart.

Perhaps one of the hottest party records ever was recently a White Label release entitled Old School Jams Vol. One. This artifact accompanies classic songs like "Dwyck," "Flava in Ya Ear (Remix)," and Biggie's unreleased freestyle "Real Nigga Do Real Things" over vintage Dr. Dre beats.

Edward Scissorhands (also directed by Burton), What's Eating Gilbert Grape?, Donnie Brasco, and most recently in Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas.

He does an excellent job as Wood, especially with his deadpan delivery when confessing his passion for cross- dressing. Sarah Jessica Parker and Patricia Arquette wonderfully portray Wood's love interests. Also turning in great performances are professional wrestler George "The Animal" Steel as wrestler turned actor Tor Johnson (all wrestlers are actors anyway) and Bill Murray as Bunny, Wood's queen confidante. Seeing Depp and Murray on screen together is interesting, since they both have played Hunter S. Thompson; Depp in Fear and Loathing and Murray in Where the Buffalo Roam.

It is a rare occasion that an Academy Award is given to someone who actually deserves it, but Martin Landau deserves more accolades than an Oscar for his dead-on portrayal of screen legend Bela Lugosi. Landau manages to make Lugosi both a figure of sympathy and a figure of fun.

The script is surprisingly inventive (seeing that it was penned by the writing team behind Problem Child), and flows seamlessly under Burton's flawless direction. The film was ignored by many, maybe due to the fact that it was filmed in black and white. But it is undoubtedly one of Tim Burton's best, and definitely something that will provide a few laughs.

If you haven't seen any of Ed Wood's films, they're available through Rhino home video, and can be found in the "cult" section in most out-of-the way video stores (Video to Go in Amherst and Pleasant St. Video in Northampton).

scarcely heard track with Mary J. Blige called "Beautiful," produced by Hi-Tek.

The rare realms of bootlegged records has recently discovered a track called "I Get Visual" performed by Rakim in 1987. The song did not make the final cut for his 18th Letter LP, but it glows with brilliance.

Undoubtably the vinyl vultures have scooped up doubles of the "Respiration" 12", with remixes by Pete Rock featuring Black Thought, however a bootleg remix of the original version has surfaced with a layered background by Dr. Luke. Both are blazing.

Hopefully this brief map will provide y'all with enough certified noise to keep your sound cavities filled till the weather warms. Stay tuned...

DiMaggio linked forever with 56–game hitting streak in 1941

By Hal Bock
Associated Press

In his last public appearance, on the final day of the 1998 baseball season, Joe DiMaggio was driven around Yankee Stadium in a '56 Ford Thunderbird.

The model year was no accident.

DiMaggio and No. 56 were linked forever after the summer of 1941 when, day after day, game after game, Joe D. delivered base hits, establishing one of the most remarkable records in sports history. Babe Ruth's record of 714 home runs fell. Roger Maris' record of 61 home runs fell. Lou Gehrig's record of 2,130 consecutive games fell.

DiMaggio's 56-game hitting streak endures.

The streak started innocently, almost unnoticed. DiMaggio was coming off two straight American League batting championships, and at 26 was already considered one of baseball's top young stars. The New York Yankees had won four World Series in his first five seasons but they were struggling at the start of 1941, stuck at .500 with a 14-14 record as they opened a three-game series against the Chicago White Sox on May 15.

DiMaggio was in a slump, held hitless in the previous two games by Cleveland aces Bob Feller and Mel Harder. But in the first inning against the White Sox, he delivered an RBI-single against Chicago's Edgar Smith. The hit hardly stood out, since the Yankees lost the game, 13-1.

Batting streaks are rarely recognized in their early stages, hardly noticed until they reach double digits. When DiMaggio went 4-for-5, including a home run and drove in three runs at Washington on May 27, the streak reached 12 games.

A week later, on the day Gehrig died at 39, DiMaggio had two hits, extending the streak to 19 games.

Now it was getting serious.

At the time, the modern National League record was 33 games by Rogers Hornsby and the American League record was 41 by George Sisler. DiMaggio's consistency was clearly a threat to those marks. In a three-game series at St. Louis, he punished Browns pitchers for seven hits in 16 at-bats, with three home runs and seven runs batted in. DiMag was on a tear.

On June 21, he blooped a first-inning single off Detroit's Dizzy Trout, extending the streak to 34 games, passing Hornsby. Sisler was the next target.

Now the pressure was on.

"That's when the public, the press and the pitchers really started noticing," he said later.

Silas steps in for Cowens as Charlotte Hornets' new coach

FORT MILL, S.C. (AP) — Paul Silas took over as the Charlotte Hornets' new coach yesterday, pledging to try to revive a franchise beset by poor play, weak leadership and injuries.

"Where this thing is going, who the heck knows? Hopefully miracles do happen," Silas said after running a nearly two-hour practice at the team's training complex.

Silas was named Charlotte's interim head coach one day after the resignation of Dave Cowens, his close friend and former teammate with the Boston Celtics in the 1970s.

Cowens, who led Charlotte to back-to-back 50-victory seasons in his first two years in Charlotte, stepped down because of mounting frustration with owner George Shinn's refusal to give him a raise. Cowens' inability to work out a deal with Shinn was just one of several problems associated with a club that is off to a 4-11 start and has seen a significant drop in attendance.

Shinn is the target of a lawsuit accusing him of unwanted sexual advances, and some fans are calling on him to sell the team if he continues to refuse to pay the money needed to retain top talent. Injuries have sidelined the team's best two players, and one of them, leading scorer Glen Rice, is the subject of ongoing trade talks with the Lakers.

Considering those circumstances, Silas acknowledged, his new job doesn't exactly look like the chance of a lifetime.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You must make up your mind to work with natural and unnatural forces, both which you cannot control today. Be flexible, move forward and adapt to change.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You'll have to change your plans today, but you can remain true to your own primary intentions. Don't get swept up in an emotional whirlwind!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You'll have the energy and the determination to take on more than required today. Even critics will be impressed by your performance at this time.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Take a chance today and you'll be able to broaden your horizons, and enjoy increased potential and maximized rewards. Don't hold back!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Your generosity will be more than appreciated today, but you must not be too quick to ask for favors in return. Adopt a soft-spoken approach.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may feel as though you're repeating yourself today, and indeed you do have the opportunity to correct minor errors made in the recent past.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may be engaging in a social "crapshoot" without knowing it today! Take precautions when you can, and be willing to "wing it."

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Others are likely to call on you to entertain today, especially when the going gets rough. Trust your sense of humor to see you through.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You won't be racing the clock so much as your own hefty expectations today. It's time to re-evaluate because you're not really working with yourself as best you can.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your creative input will be appreciated on the job, but that is not a license to speak your mind at all times. Know when to keep quiet!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You and a partner or co-worker are not likely to agree on the methods required to get the job done today. If possible, a compromise is in order.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Now is not the time to "save the best for last." You may not get to everything today if you wait too long and let your schedule become overly full.

Tuesday, March 9, 1999 — The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

DiMaggio was mythical hero of baseball world

By birth and by choice I am a Boston Red Sox fan. For me, the New York Yankees represent pretty much all that is wrong with the world of baseball (granted that's kind of a broad, sweeping statement).

Of course, as a Red Sox fan, I am also a baseball fan. As such, I can appreciate the history of the game, the legend that is baseball. And as a true baseball fan, it is obvious to me that the sport has lost something mythical now that Joe DiMaggio has passed away.

Last October, DiMaggio underwent surgery for lung cancer. After what seemed like a daily watch from his deathbed as the famous slugger battled back from pneumonia and other setbacks, DiMaggio regained his strength and health. He was even scheduled to throw out the first pitch at Yankee Stadium on Opening Day.

Unfortunately, he will not be there. His death yesterday at age 84 came not as a shock, but as a small surprise. Of course, DiMaggio wasn't expected to live forever; but his death somehow signals the end of a era, a time of real, live human heros.

That was what DiMaggio was. And that is what his legend will continue to represent. DiMaggio was "baseball player." During his playing days, most critics listed Ted Williams as a better all-around ballplayer. Some even argued that, statistically speaking, Stan Musial should be listed ahead of DiMaggio.

Without question, Willie Mays was a better centerfielder. Williams a better hitter. Mickey Mantle and Babe Ruth were more renowned. But DiMaggio was baseball, plain and simple.

His nickname was the Yankee Clipper, and it was more of an honorary title than a locker room nickname. He was a veritable king in a time when baseball truly was the national pastime. He personified success, from his 13 seasons of work patrolling centerfield for the Yanks to his amazing 56- game hitting streak to his nine World Series championships.

I am a baseball fan, and still relatively new to a game that many of my peers have been studying since they started kindergarten. But there are certain numbers any card- carrying baseball fan knows: that Jackie Robinson broke the major league color barrier in 1947; that until last summer Roger Maris was the home run king with 61 longballs; that Roger Clemens struck out 20; and that DiMaggio wowed the crowd in '41 with hits in 56 straight.

He began that legendary streak with a first–inning single against the Chicago White Sox on May 15, 1941 in a 13–1 Yankees' loss. Two months and a day later, on July 16, the slugger connected for a single in Cleveland's old League Park that extended the streak to 56 games.

In the next 20 years, only three men hit safely in 30 consecutive games.

That was DiMaggio. Wonder, in an workhorse kind of way. Splendor, in a awe–inspiring kind of way. "He's a symbol of class and magnificence, the last if his kind," wrote CNN/SI's Jim Huber today. Leigh Montville echoed that by writing, "He never said anything wrond, he never did anything wrong."

Indeed, DiMaggio represented all that was right with the world in post-war America, a time Frank Deford described as "the only time we've ever had an Oz." DiMaggio wore stylish double–breasted suits. He ate at the classiest joints. He married America's sweetheart, Marilyn Monroe.

Of course, even heros have trouble and DiMaggio was no exception. He was never comfortable when the public hounded him. His marriage to Monroe fell apart. For many celebrities this would spell doom. But not for DiMaggio. He was still one of America's heros.

Amazingly, he was not the first choice for inclusion when Paul Simon was writing "Mrs. Robinson." DiMaggio's name ended up in the lyrics because Mickey Mantle's name sounded too awkward.

"Where have you gone Joe DiMaggio, a nation turns its lonely eyes to you."

It will be hard to explain to my kids what DiMaggio, and even people like Ruth and Mantle, Mays and Williams, Musial and Robinson, and countless others, meant to baseball. They will become just names, not real live heros, people who embody the majesty that is baseball.

They will hear the tales of the Yankee Clipper. They may read stories of his accomplishments. They may ask how a Red Sox fan could actually like a Yankee great.

I will tell them what baseball means to me and what DiMaggio meant to baseball.

Sadly, that is all that is left now. Words. Pictures. Memories.

Women's water polo wins 7th

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Laurie Edwards and the rest of the women's water polo team improved to 7–0 over the weekend.

By Lawrence Redford
Collegian Staff

Over the weekend, the Massachusetts women's water polo team improved its perfect record to 7–0. The Minutewomen swept the Princeton Invitational, defeating two more ranked teams, the 13th–ranked Princeton Tigers, and No. 16 Maryland Lady Terrapins. Slippery Rock and George Washington also fell victim to UMass.

On the first day of the event, Massachusetts squared off with Maryland and Slippery Rock. Maryland was the early game. UMass was able to edge out the Lady Terps, winning 9–7. Katie Grogan established herself right away by posting a hat trick in the opening game. Marcie Hupp equaled Grogan, netting three goals of her own in the win.

The next game against Slippery Rock was an easy victory for the Minutewomen, who won by a landside 17–5. Six Massachusetts players had two goals in this game: Claudia Clement, Grogan, Hupp, Erin Hiller, Megan Perry and Meghan Thompson. Dana Sinkwich and Thompson saw time but not many shots in the net, as Sinkwich saved two and Thompson had one save.

After the Saturday meet, the Minutewomen were at 2–0 in the competition and had beaten one ranked team. The next day would bring George Washington and No. 13 Princeton.

The first game on Sunday matched the Minutewomen against GW. This match was over before it started. UMass tallied six goals in the opening period and never looked back. GW had difficulty stopping the UMass attack and the Colonials were defeated 14–0. The shut–out was a combined effort. Sinkwich had three saves while Thompson chipped in with two saves. Yet again UMass was on the offensive, as Anne Dethloff showed her talents by netting three goals, while Grogan also had a hat trick of her own.

The last game for the Minutewomen was against host Princeton. In the past UMass has handled Princeton easily, going 6–0 against the Tigers last year. This year's game held true to form with the Massachusetts winning, 8–2. Grogan showing why she leads the team in scoring, notching another hat trick. Laurie Edwards contributed with two goals.

The Minutewomen dominated the entire event, outscoring their opponents, 46–14. The team has improved to 7–0 and in the process defeated two more ranked teams, bringing their win total against ranked teams to four (No. 12 Michigan and No. 17 Villanova at the Villanova Invitational).

Grogan showed why she led last year's team in scoring. She had a trio of hat tricks en route to scoring 11 goals to lead UMass. This brings Grogan's goal total to 16, while junior Hupp added seven goals, bringing her total to 15. With these two almost mirroring each other's efforts, it makes it near impossible for their opponent to defend them.

The team has a West Coast road trip coming up, starting on March 12 and ending March 17. The team will need Hupp's and Grogan's prolific scoring abilities for this trip because the Minutewomen will face six ranked teams over the course of five days. The road swing begins with No. 11 U.C. San Diego, continues with on March 13 with fifth– ranked San Diego State. On March 15th, there is a doubleheader against No. 18 Pacific and No. 12 Long Beach State. March 16 the Minutewomen travel to No. 4 UCLA and end the road trip with ninth–ranked U.C. Santa Barbara.

This is the most challenging portion of the Minutewomen's schedule, and the grueling six–games–in– five–days road trip could make or break UMass' season. Though the team's tendency has been to score early and often, they have also allowed opponents to get back in the game late.

UM men's tennis goes 2–1 on the weekend

By Seth Szilagyi
Collegian Staff

Revenge was on the minds of the Massachusetts men's tennis team as it headed south to play three matches in two days: Maryland, George Washington and Bloomsburg all defeated UMass last season and the Minutemen were looking to avenge those losses.

The Minutemen accomplished their goal, as they defeated Maryland and George Washington, but lost to Bloomsburg.

In the Maryland match, the Minutemen were victorious 4– 3, as juniors Rob Manchester and Bo Navarro lead the way with wins over Kyle Cerminara, 6–4, 6–0, and Luan Nguyen, 6–0, 6–3, respectively.

The deciding factor of the match was walk–on sophomore Bill Greener. He forced James Legat into a third–set tiebreaker, as Legat was experiencing terrible leg cramps and struggled to finish the match. Greener came out victorious, for his first win, 6–7 (7–5), 6–4, 7–6 (7–5).

"This is the first time Bill traveled with us," said assistant coach Justin Lynn. "It showcased his talent and heart. It was a fantastic effort."

Parsa Samii and Todd Champeau put in a large contribution, coming back to win 9–8 (10) after they were down 7–3.

UMass came up victorious again on Saturday as they downed the George Washington Colonials, 4–1. Freshman Steve Prisco defeated Kent Wright, as Wright retired two games into the first set with the flu. Manchester snatched up another win against Kevin Wright, 6–2, 6–2, and junior Samii defeated Kinzie Wright, 7–5, 6–0.

Josh Bainton beat Mike Stein, 6–0, 1–0, as Stein retired due to cramps. The doubles weren't played because the match had already been decided.

"To say George Washington was unprepared is an understatement," said UMass coach Judy Dixon.

The win leaves the Minutemen in good shape for the Atlantic 10 tournament, with a probable No. 3 slot.

"On paper, this is the biggest victory that UMass has ever had. However, they were unprepared and unfortunately that takes a little away from the win," said Dixon.

The UMass winning streak came to a halt in its third meeting of the weekend at Bloomsburg University, as the team went down 5–2.

"They are an excellent team. The match could have gone either way," Dixon said of the loss.

Samii picked up his second singles win of the weekend defeating David Wolfe, 7–6 (7–5), 2–6, 6–4. Navarro almost pulled out a victory against Andre Naylor, who he had faced twice earlier in his career and lost, but went on to lose again in a close match, 6–7 (6–2), 6–2, 6–3.

Manchester finished up the weekend with his third singles victory against Tyler Hunsberger. Hunsberger forced a third set, but Manchester took home the win, 6–3, 4–6, 6–4.

"Bobbie played outstanding tennis. It's great to have him return to form after his slump," said Dixon.

In doubles action, the Minutemen were led by the duo of Navarro and senior Todd Chaney. They defeated Wolfe and Naylor, 8–5.

"We've worked through the accident and the sickness. I'm very positive about the team for the rest of the season," Dixon said of the weekend.

The Minutemen return to action on March 27, when they travel to Colgate University at 12 p.m.

Men's gymnastics wears down Army

Junior Jeff LaValle wins all–around, sets UMass parallel bars record

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team went two–for–two this weekend as it crushed the Army Cadets at its last home meet and dominated at the New England Championships once again.

On Friday, UMass went against Army, a meet at which junior Jeff LaVallee once again came out on top for the Minutemen, while breaking the school record on the parallel bars, and predictably winning the all–around competition.

LaVallee won the all–around with a 57.80, broke the school record on parallel bars (9.90) for the second straight week, and tied his own school mark on the vault (9.80) that he set last weekend.

He also came in first place on high bar (9.75) and the floor exercise (9.65), while taking the third spot on the still rings (9.20), and fourth on pommel horse (9.50).

Senior captain Stephen Pryor took second in the all–around with a 54.20, while coming in first on rings (9.40) and placing second on the horse (9.70). Sophomore Bryan McNulty placed second on both the floor exercise (9.60) and vault (9.65), while sophomore J.J. Hershey finished second on high bar (9.45) and rings (9.30).

Also among the top finishers from UMass was senior Dan Young, who snagged the third spot on floor (9.40) and fourth on vault (9.40). And starting the Minutemen off on the right foot on the vault and high bar, sophomore Michael Alexander had impressive third place finishes of 9.50 and 9.40 on the two events respectively.

"It was really nice to see Mike start us off that well," said UMass coach Roy Johnson. "He nailed that vault, and his high bar set was a great surprise. It's nice to have the first guy up score that high."

The squad kept its momentum going when it traveled to Springfield on Sunday and once again took the title as New England Champion. UMass won with a score of 224.525 with Springfield College (201.650) and Southern Connecticut (198.900) trailing substantially behind.

LaVallee won the all–around with a 56.375 and placed first on floor (9.65), rings (9.55), vault (9.725), parallel bars (9.70), and tied his all–time school record on high bar (9.85).

Pryor came in second in the all–around with a 54.350 and took the third place spots on rings (9.45), floor (9.50), and a tie for third with senior Phil Lieberman on vault (9.3). The New York native also took the third place spot on parallel bars with a score of 9.30.

The seniors certainly made their mark in Springfield on Sunday as both Young and Brad LeClair had some of their highest scores of the season. LeClair took the second place score on pommel horse (9.40) and Young finished second on both the floor exercise (9.55) and vault (9.40).

Lieberman tied with Pryor for third on vault (9.30) and came in fourth for UMass on floor (9.40). Former captain Mike Plourde also contributed to the Minutemen with a 9.15 on the floor.

Freshman Matt Plumser stepped up and took his season all–time best score on parallel bars (9.35), earning him the silver at the meet. Coming back from a broken hand earlier in the season, sophomore Andy Leis took the second place spot overall on high bar (9.30) and an 8.85 on his first time competing floor this year.

McNulty scored a 9.30 on the floor exercise, and Hershey won the pommel horse competition (9.55), earned an 8.95 on his first floor competition of the year, and also scored a 9.25 on the parallel bars.

"I think I did well overall," said Hershey. "There's some more fine–tuning that needs to be done in my routine, but overall, it was a good set."

UMass has a week off from competition as it prepares for the Springfield meet next Thursday and the ECAC Championships at the William D. Mullins Center on March 26–27.

Affirmative action 101

Hampshire faculty speak about affirmative action

BETH KIRKORIAN / COLLEGIAN

A speaker from Hampshire College's Affirmative Action Office spoke about the current status of affirmative action during a student teach–in at the college last night.

While Amherst College was hosting Ward Connerly, an outspoken opponent of using race in college admissions, a five–member panel addressed 100 students at Hampshire College's Franklin Patterson Hall for an informational teach– in and discussion about affirmative action.

Marlene Fried, director of the civil liberties and public policy program at Hampshire College, attempted to demystify some misconceptions about affirmative action. She addressed what she called the "invisibility of discrimination," and the common perception that affirmative action is equivalent to racial quotas that result in the acceptance and hiring of the unqualified.

She admitted that affirmative action policies are inherently discrimatory in nature. "But not all discrimination is bad because not all discrimination results in the systematic exclusion of a group of people," she said.

She then challenged affirmative action opponents to "find data to show that white males are being systematically excluded," at which point the audience laughed.

Fried quoted civil rights activist Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., who said in a 1965 speech that people should not be judged by the color of their skin, but instead by the content of their character. She attacked affirmative action opponents who "abuse" King's vision of a color–blind society to promote an anti–affirmative action stance.

These people, she said, envision America as a "meritocracy," and view affirmative action as a means of dismantling the meritocracy.

But, she countered, "We don't have one, we never had one, and we cannot have one if we systematically exclude people. How can you be picking the best when many of the best people were never in the running?"

Hampshire College president Greg Prince agreed.

"We cannot afford to exclude anyone," he said. "We need the best and brightest of everyone if we are going to survive as a society... Affirmative action is 90 percent simply good managerial practice."

He discussed Hampshire College's aggressive campaign to recruit underrepresented students and faculty members, strategies he is willing to go to court to defend. But in an interview immediately following the forum, he also defended University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott, responding to his recent decision to change the issue of race in the University's admissions practices.

"He was trying to keep control of it [the situation] and not let those opposed to the goal [of affirmative action] get control," Prince said. "He was attempting to be pro–active in terms of keeping control."

UMass student organizer Resa Singleton also addressed the crowd to help explain the circumstances surrounding the recent change in admissions practices at UMass and the student campaign to protest the change.

Connerly states that stereotypes are wrong

BETH KIRKORIAN / COLLEGIAN

Ward Connerly, chairman of the American Civil Rights Institution, spoke about affirmative action at last night's forum at Amherst College.

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Ward Connerly, one of the nation's most prominent opponents of race–based affirmative action, spoke at Amherst college yesterday.

Connerly is the chairman of the American Civil Rights Institution, and served as the chair of the Proposition 209 Committee. Proposition 209 was a successful voter referendum which banned race–sensitive admissions at California public colleges and universities. Connerly also was influential in the passing of a similar referendum in the state of Washington.

"To me, it transcends ideology," Connerly said. "It transcends partisanship. It goes beyond race."

Connerly repeatedly stated that he does not oppose affirmative action, only the use of race in admissions.

"John Kennedy said in 1963, 'Race has no place in American life or law'," said Connerly.

"The implication was that the government was supposed to be blind to race, whatever that term means. And as we see more crossing of ethnic and racial lines in our nation, we're finding that the term race has less and less meaning."

Connerly added — "But whatever it means, the view of the nation... is that race should not be a factor in how we are treated by our government," he added. "It shouldn't play a part."

Connerly suggested that income be used as a factor in admissions rather than skin color.

"The presumption that all people of color and disadvantaged is wrong," he said. "The presumption that all white people are privileged is wrong."

Many of the students attending the forum were angered at Connerly's comments and several booed when he entered.

Several fliers were distributed amongst the audience, including one entitled "Some of the Effects of the Elimination of Affirmative Action." The flier stated that, after the passage of Proposition 209, the number of African Americans at the University of California–Berkeley dropped 66%, while the number of Latino students decreased 53%.

After Connerly spoke, the crowd was allowed to air their grievances in a question–and–answer period.

Amherst College student Justin Snider read a list of statistics concerning the role of minorities in our society. According to Snider, despite the fact that white men comprise only 33% of the population, they constitute 80% of all university professors, 86% of partners at major law firms, and 90% of the United States Senate.

When he finished reading the statistics, the audience burst into thunderous applause.

Snider said that there are only three possible explanations: "First, you could say that that's random, which I think is ridiculous. Second, you could say white males are superior, and me being a white male I can tell you they're not. Third, which I think is the right answer, is that the game has been stacked."

Mahmood Keiabchi, the chair of the University of Massachusetts Educational Access Committee, mentioned the recent changes in affirmative action at UMass.

"You are saying that the Board of Trustees should not give a shit about what the students think!" he said.

Many of the students at the forum were shocked that an African–American would oppose race–based affirmative action policies. While Connerly rarely made an issue of his race, he is often referred to in the media as a "black opponent of affirmative action".

"He's putting a black face on the issue," said Dean Robinson, an assistant professor of political science at UMass. "It's a fact that organizations on the right actively recruit black membership... he's leading the charges, and he is not easily tagged as a racist."

Student Government to hold first rally

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association will be holding their first rally today to talk about affirmative action, how they're going to handle the situation and how they operate on a daily basis.

The rally, which will be on the steps of the Student Union at 1:00 p.m. is being done by the SGA's public policy and relations committee.

"We're going to talk about the motion [affirmative action]. Right now it's in committee and a compromise is trying to be reached between pro–student caucuses and other caucuses. They're trying to resolve this so a stance will be made in the Senate," said Jared Brooslin, Southwest senator and chair of public policy and relations committee.

They will also be talking about tuition raises and what SGA does with 1.5 million dollars and how it is dispersed to RSOs.

Lisa Cook, speaker of the senate and Jodi Bailey, associate speaker will be at the rally to address some of the issues.

The public policy and relations committee decided to hold the rallies to try to recruit more students to take part in SGA, and also to let student know how the SGA works and how it effects them. This all stems from what the SGA describes as a lack of involvement.

"There is under representation of students in Senate. Thirty seats are open and there's 250 students per sent, so students aren't getting heard. I hope more people get involved in some aspects of the SGA," said Brooslin.

"It's not all boring politics. You get to meet people and make friends. It actually can be interesting and you get a chance to see how politics work," he said.

Boyden gymnasium site of numerous locker thefts

Campus police issue safety alert

The University of Massachusetts Police Department issued a public safety alert yesterday to warn the campus community about a number of thefts that occurred in Boyden Gymnasium this past weekend.

According to the alert, the suspect has been going through the locker room areas searching for unsecured lockers.

The suspect may also be using bolt cutters to remove locks.

This weekend's thefts have involved personal items such as keys, money, and clothing.

No description of the suspect is yet available.

Police are cautioning the UMass community to be on alert for suspicious individuals.

The Department of Public Safety also reminds students and staff members to "always secure lockers, desks and offices when they are not in use."

Two athletes reported property stolen from the locker room on Feb. 24.

University police thought this was an isolated incident at the time.

Anyone with information is encouraged to contact the UMass police at 545–2121.

Activist opposes affirmative action

By Lenny Holston
Collegian Staff

To many minorities, Ward Connerly is at best a contradiction and at worst an Uncle Tom. Connerly is a black man who opposes affirmative action, and a very influential man at that.

As chairman of the American Civil Rights Institute and member of the University of California Board of Regents, he was the force behind Proposition 209 which ended racial preferences of any kind in California and created a movement that is sweeping the nation.

Ward Connerly is a savior to the conservative movement. He speaks with profound elegance and passion about things that conservative whites would be called racist for saying. He also speaks about the issues that racists think behind closed doors. People that would never allow a black to date their sons or daughters, own a home in their neighborhood, or join their country clubs love Ward Connerly, an African– American, as a political icon.

Speaking last night at Amherst College, Connerly proved to be a polarizing figure. He breaks all rules of what a black should be. He himself states "identities of groups are arbitrary".

News Analysis

He is a black conservative. When pressed by UMass graduate student, Kiya Stokes, he admits that under his ideology, not even Martin Luther King, Jr. would qualify for admittance into the UC system.

Ward Connerly is bigger than the current affirmative action debate. As he states "no one's life experience can be summed by what he or she checks off on a box". True. Connerly himself has benefitted from the civil rights struggle, but he is fighting for the different, and often ignored civil right — the right for a person of color to think for himself.

Blacks in particular have longed been discouraged from travelling outside the realm of prescribed blackness, whether it be listening to "white" music, speaking grammatically correct, etc. Not every black person thinks this way and whites are not innocent of the reverse, but this stranglehold of blackness is at the heart of the problem facing Ward Connerly's everywhere. George Davila, an Amherst College sophomore political science major and Cuban–American, says "it is racist for someone to criticize political affiliation because of the color of their skin. Questioning Black conservatism is racist itself".

This is not to justify Connerly's position on this issue. His reasoning for the ending of affirmative action in order to end racism ignore the facts. He even "disagrees with the premise that we are living

Campus profile

By Jason Trenkle
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Adam DeCruz, a senior political science major and acting president of the Inter-Fraternity Council (IFC) doesn't have the easiest of jobs.

In fact, bringing the Greek fraternity area together under the same social policies while working to protect their image may be one of the hardest jobs on campus.

DeCruz's primary responsibility is to manage matters of various fraternity chapters, including the registry of off-campus events such as parties.

"Each chapter runs itself individually, but it is our purpose to bring the fraternities together," DeCruz said. "Being on IFC, it's a lot of busy work. I have to be in touch with members off-campus that come in to discuss an event that they're looking to put on."

The Greek system DeCruz refers to consists of social organizations and social fraternities which IFC presides over.

As newly-elected President of the council this semester, DeCruz has become interested in redefining the image of fraternities on UMass campus.

"The difficult part occurs, not with the fraternity in general, but in changing the image of fraternities," DeCruz said. "The problem is when an incident occurs at a fraternity, it is published. The positives, and the things fraternities take part in are never let known."

DeCruz's work focuses primarily on the activity occurring within the Greek system.

All of the weekend events and community events social fraternities put on must first go through DeCruz and the IFC Council members, which consist of the chapters present at the meeting.

The IFC adheres to the Greek social policies as a means of governing the fraternities. Any chapter in violation of social policy, will be summoned to a meeting with the Greek Affairs and with IFC. DeCruz helps determine the sanctions to issue according to the violation in question. However, issues such as alcohol violations are out of his jurisdiction.

DeCruz grew up in Rockport, Mass and played football and basketball on his high school team including being a co- founder of the school's only chess team. Throughout his secondary education, he was involved in community service events, and DeCruz says this is one of the reasons he was interested in joining a fraternity.

"Our basketball team would put on a clinic every winter, and we would teach kids the fundamentals of basketball," DeCruz said.

A close friend of DeCruz attended UMass in '93 and pledged at Delta Chi fraternity. It was the stories he brought back that caused DeCruz to look into the opportunity.

"He got me really interested in it," DeCruz said. "He was telling me how being in a fraternity could help you out in college and later in life."

While attending rush meetings for the Delta Chi fraternity, DeCruz felt his most unique experience was meeting all the people. Still, he had reservations as to the long-term effects of getting involved.

"At first I thought it was an empty promise, but it turned out that it wasn't," DeCruz said. "I went to see what it was like and they gave me a bid, I signed it, and started pledging."

Through the pledging, DeCruz felt as if he had met a whole new family and it helped in his transition to a new school. After becoming a member, he filled an IFC representative position to further learn about how the Greek community was run.

DeCruz indicates how a group from the Delta Upsilon fraternity shows their community support each year by pulling a chariot along the Mass. Turnpike from Boston to Amherst to help raise money for charity.

Other community service events DeCruz has helped to sponsor and organize include a kettle drive in which DeCruz and the brothers set up different stations among local towns and helped raise money for the Salvation Army.

The abolishment of fraternities at other colleges like Dartmouth University is an issue that concerns DeCruz and the IFC. However, he is dedicated to changing the image distinctions between "us" [the Greek community] and "them" [the University].

"I feel the Greek community is misrepresented among the college," DeCruz said. "We're attempting to change our image within the eyes of the community right now, and with that we're hoping it'll change the perception people in the schools have also."

Cannabis plans Amherst rally, invite to Olver

The Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) received approval from the Town of Amherst last week to hold a rally April 24 on the town common.

CRC spokesperson Terry Franklin said the rally's agenda would combine speakers with breaks for bands to play. It would run from noon to dusk.

State representative John Olver (D-Amherst) may be a speaker at the rally, according to Franklin who said Olver was invited but has not yet responded with an answer.

Franklin said in addition to the speakers, dozens of other groups would be setting up information tables on the common.

A crowd of 1,000–1,500 is expected for the rally which Franklin said is typical for this type of event.

The rally is a result of work between the CRC, Amherst College, Hampshire College groups and the Pioneer Valley NORML.

QTK means preparing sexuality

By Veronica MacDonald
Collegian Correspondent

Diverse UMass alumni have found diverse experiences in the workplace. It was these experiences which a QTK (Queer Two Thousand) panel discussion brought to the University of Massachusetts Campus Center last night.

The panel spoke about the issues that men and women encounter when they are open about their sexuality in the workplace.

Amy Hoffman, periodicals director for the magazine World, spoke about her writing career at a gay weekly newspaper that her parents thought would ruin her resume. Hoffman knew there was an enormous hole missing when she taught freshman writing at UMass as a graduate student. She was only open to her supervisors, not her students. She says that it was "a strange sandwich" and agonized about it constantly. Hoffman felt that at the time, coming out would jeopardize a joint learning enterprise in the classroom.

Lesley Stone, a case manager and community liaison with community group Ethos, feels that her field is fairly open and liberal, but tension is inevitable because companies usually assume heterosexuality.

Stone recently gathered research in San Francisco about senior gay people. There is a senior population there that Stone says is gay, but they have not come out and may never.

Most of the panel have attended work celebrations, in which they have introduced their partners to others. They feel that it is important to be open in the workplace, but it is still a difficult issue. Wilson said that first and foremost you must be yourself and understand that people who are seventy years old tend to be traditionalists, a product of their times.

Advice was offered from Steve Panglione, an employee of a software production corporation, for interviews. He feels that people should interview the interviewer, ask for an office tour, research the company before the interview, and most importantly, ask about domestic partnership policies.

Stone also felt that people should select a workplace that has good vibes initially, feels comfortable, and to question about the people, and survey the diversity in the office.

Most important of all, Stone feels that a support network is essential for people who have come out. They don't need to be biological family, but family that is formed through friendships.

Dianne Dunn of the Career Network feels that few resources exist for gay and lesbian students and panels such as these should help those who have come out.

The discussion was organized by the Campus Career Network, Stonewall Center, EDS, and Pride Alliance.

Blackmun laid to rest

By Laurie Asseo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Harry A. Blackmun was eulogized yesterday as a man with a "conscientious, humane judicial vision" who sought to understand the people whose lives his Supreme Court opinions would affect.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, Attorney General Janet Reno and humorist Garrison Keillor joined Blackmun's family, friends and Supreme Court colleagues at a memorial service for the retired justice who died last Thursday at age 90.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who succeeded Blackmun on the nation's highest court in 1994, said he "made a direct, conscious effort to reach out and understand those whose life experience was different from his own."

His accomplishments during 24 years on the court "reveal a vision, a conscientious, humane judicial vision, which he applied in one area of the law after another," including equal protection of the sexes and races, Breyer said.

Blackmun got tens of thousands of letters after he authored the 1973 Roe vs. Wade opinion that legalized abortion nationwide. One very long letter urged Blackmun to resign, Breyer said, and the justice's reply was succinct: "Dear Sir, No. Sincerely, Harry A. Blackmun."

in a racist society" and "questions the diversity of (traditionally African-American) Morehouse College" and sees nothing wrong with the new lack of diversity at the UC system. He ought to be challenged for being an apologist for white privilege. He should not be questioned for being "black enough", no one can or should make that determination.

When all is said and done, Connerly added nothing to the Valley's affirmative action crisis. Each side is now even more galvanized than ever and feeling validated in their opinion. What Connerly did contribute to all of us, especially minorities, is a new way to look at ourselves, as individuals. He may have started the debate that ends the upward mobility of minorities, but he has also started a discussion of inward mobility, too.

Request to make Clinton home a museum nixed

By David A. Lieb
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark.— State lawmakers on yesterday rejected a request for $500,000 to be put toward converting President Clinton's boyhood home into a museum.

The bill's sponsor ran from the House chamber in tears. Many representatives who voted against the bill said it had nothing to do with Clinton, but with the source of the money. The project would have been funded immediately, instead of having to compete later with scores of other local projects.

Rep. Sandra Rodgers, a Democrat from Clinton's native Hope, rushed from the House chamber after the vote and cried in the Capitol halls.

Hey...try some seals!

Our lives are highlighted by predictable, monotonous patterns of behavior. For instance, it's pretty much inevitable that after reading a first sentence as boring as that, you're not going to read the rest of this editorial. However, if I put something like this in:

"Free naked people!"

Hey, maybe then you'd read. There are, however, no free naked people in this editorial. Try Southwest.

Instead, this is a story about three moments of staggering unpredict-ability, uncomfort-ability, and a few more words starting with "un."

Bryan McAllister

There are those times when our lives are interrupted by something absurd, and we really have no idea what will happen next. One of my professors called this "liiffshfffs." I think he was drunk at the time. Anyway, I think he was trying to say, "liminality." It's some term coined by some philosopher... or something.

The primary example of a state of unpredictability is a power outage. Remember the one we had last semester? Some people thought the world was ending. Other people were laughing at the people who thought the world was ending. Still others were sleeping, oblivious to the fact that the world might be ending and that hysterical laughter was occurring for no particular reason.

Power outages were my favorite as a kid, except for the bonding part. For some reason, my parents always assumed that when the power went out, and there was really nothing to do, that we should all light candles and play endless games of Uno.

"Draw four, Bryan."

"Screw you, Dad."

(We're a very competitive family).

Moments of liminality stick in our heads like bubble gum on, well... anything. I can almost remember all of the hurricanes I have lived through, mostly because after a hurricane, I like to climb a hill, look up at the sky and say, "Nice try, punk."

Or remember when that little girl, Jessica, got stuck in a well for a couple days? Or the Blizzard of '78? Or Oj? I can't remember what I was doing when the Gulf War started, but man, I won't forget seeing that white Bronco race across the L.A. highways.

Nothing, however, compares to the following three things that happened to me last week.

Tuesday, March 2 — Hampshire Dining Hall:

The chaos started when the DC ran out of sub rolls, leaving all the students extremely confused and forced into eating large amounts of pita bread. Some students were so shocked that they started to protest, because that seems like the thing to do these days.

I have a big problem with pita bread, because no one has ever explained to me what pita is, and why it's involved with bread.

Wednesday, March 3 — My dorm:

The next equally devastating event involved all the Cherry Coke, the nectar of the gods, were sold out in the vending machine. There is no greater frustration than pressing the Cherry Coke button and having nothing happen. I think it's a Freudian-male performance issue thing.

I would have been able to deal with both of these tragic occurrences, I think. I didn't eat subs or drink Cherry Coke for that whole week, but I survived. I'm a survivor. But then the unthinkable happened.

Wednesday, March 3 — The TV:

Last week at around that time, Univision, the Spanish channel, number 30 on our cable service, produced days of dead air. A tragedy of Shakespearean proportions. I'll readily admit — the Spanish channel is my life.

Sure, I've never taken Spanish and I can't even say, "Where are the topless beaches?" but there's something purely fun and festive about the programming on that channel. The soap operas look more passionate and the game shows are filled with men exploiting women. Even the news programs have beautiful anchor girls. Yay, Europe! They know what's up...

> "...we should change these monotonous patterns of behavior, and instead of eating chicken and pasta all the time, perhaps some seals or hyenas."

Anyway, these fiascos taught me some lessons. The first is that moments of unpredictability allow us moments of escape from the daily rigors of our lives. They unite us and make us realize that we're all "in this" together. The second lesson was that hey, Surge ain't that bad. The third is that perhaps we should change these monotonous patterns of behavior, and instead of eating chicken and pasta all the time, perhaps some seals or hyenas.

Lent is here!

As we look out our windows, we realize that spring will not come soon enough. However, we do have something to keep ourselves occupied while we wait. That's right, ladies and gentlemen, its time for Lent! For those who do not know what Lent is, it's the 40-day period right before Easter, the most sacred of Christian holidays. In the Christian tradition, the faithful must let go of certain physical pleasures during this time to prepare themselves spiritually. Almost every religion has some period of self-denial, often brought about as some method of purification. For all you good Christians out there, here is your chance for sacrifice.

Wait! I sense you cringing. Why do you cringe? Sacrifice these days can actually be, may I say, "a blessing." I know all of you out there are not greedy, materialistic gremlins like me, but I found some things that college students could sacrifice that may make their lives a little bit easier. Thus it is stated in the pages of the Book of Boo (my columns), that "even college kids can make sacrifices. For those who are not enlightened, there is hope written in these pages..."

No Homework:

This is one of the oldest tricks in the book, and It just does not work (not that I have tried). However, I have added it in just for cheesy nostalgic reasons. Just go up to your professor and say, "I'm sorry, professor, but I needed to sacrifice my homework to God. I will start doing homework in about a month." Although you might derive humor out of it, I highly doubt that you will get off the hook. There is a separation of Church and State...

No Food:

When I write "No Food," I do not mean starve yourselves. I mean, do the traditional American sacrifice: no chocolate, no candy, no junk food, etc... You know, this indeed may actually be helpful to the 55 percent or so Americans who are overweight. Along with a regular exercise regiment, you too could start losing weight in five weeks or so. Just call it holy dieting.

No TV:

(Gasp!) No TV? What else can we use to understand the intricate workings of society? No TV may sound harsh, but what would you be missing? Entertainment? Well, South Park has gone down the drain, E.R. is without Dr. Ross., and Beverly Hills 90210 is just plain (I know what this program has done for society, but it has outlived its usefulness). News? Read the Collegian. It has everything you need to be informed (I'm not being paid for this, honest!).

No Cussing:

We take our use of language so much for granted, we have the tendency to compress entire dialects into a few, simple words. What if we were to abstain from those common four-letter words in describing the world? It might help in developing our vocabularies. However, if the need becomes too great to spurt out a random word to explain everything, why not try new words? These new words can carry the same meanings, but they are designed to make the speaker look more intellectual and more cultured. Words such as "preposterous" and "hogwash" fit the bill, and even "clutch" gives the speaker a more pleasant air. Try it sometime.

No Brand Name Clothes:

This one is a challenge because we are virtual slaves to big name brands. Since you are not acceptable in society without your Abercrombie-Fitch shirts, Tommy Hilfiger jackets, and Nike sneakers, only the faithful should try this one. Although you may feel naked (you actually may be since you may not have another kind of clothes), I'm sure you can participate in a successful withdrawal. When the ordeal is over, you may realize that money can be spent on more practical things than elaborate clothes (like "The Book of Boo"). Send a check or money order in six easy payments of $49.99 to "Boo, P.O. Box BOO, Boo street, Boo, Massachusetts. I'm not a capitalist, honest!).

No Sex:

As dramatic and horrifying as "No Sex" sounds, there are ways to make the habit of not equating "no" with "no," this could be made into an interesting response to a guy at a party. Imagine, you are with a group of your friends when a drunk guy stumbles over to your group, and asks you to dance. You agree, and have a great time. However, Johnny was more than your company. So, instead of saying "No," or "I'm not ready for this yet," will get off the hook. There is a separation of Church and State...

> "Respond as a good Christian: "Sorry, I'd love to shag you, but I am abstaining from sex for Lent." "

No Food:

When I write "No Food," I do not mean starve yourselves. I mean, do the traditional American sacrifice: no chocolate, no candy, no junk food, etc... You know, this indeed may actually be helpful to the 55 percent or so Americans who are overweight. Along with a regular exercise regiment, you too could start losing weight in five weeks or so. Clarification on systemic outreach

To the Editor:

In his letter to the Collegian on March 2, Richard McPalmer refers to comments I made at the Graduate Student Senate on systemic outreach to Middle Schools as a strategy to get more students on a path of success to graduate with preparation for a four-year University of College.

He quotes me as stating that the program may take thirty or forty years to produce any discernible results. This is not correct. I did say that without such an outreach program, it might take schools thirty years to bring students up to twelfth grade with a performance that reflects their full potential. The strategy of systemic outreach is to overcome the deficits in so many students' lives in a short time frame.

Asinine columns have to go

To the Editor:

On Tuesday, March 2, there appeared a piece in the Collegian's Ed/Op page that was so bad, so devoid of anything interesting, so mind-numbingly asinine, that I simply had to write to express my anguish. I think that sending it actually made me dumber.

At the beginning of this mindless little exercise, author Aaron Saykin made reference to hate mail he has received, apparently in response to a couple of pieces he wrote about his friend Bernie the evidently called them "Weekend at Bernie's I and II). This piece was about also about Bernie, and I sincerely hope that the first pieces were not as bad as this one. If that were true, I would really be disturbed. The piece isn't funny, it isn't cool, and it isn't crazy. It is just very, very boring.

Saykin should stick to the sports page where his peculiar brand of lame, childish humor can in some way be appreciated and leave the rest of us alone. The Collegian, I should think, would like to uphold the solid reputation that it has worked hard to attain. Printing pieces like Saykin's is no way to do it. He may be tolerable while mindlessly reeling off statistics in sports stories, but his opinions (and adventures) have proven to be nothing but painful to us. Please end the misery.

Affirmative action: ah, who needs it?

Unless you've been sleeping through the last two weeks — which is actually not too unlikely if you're a graduating senior — you've undoubtedly become aware of the current debate about affirmative action at UMass. Essentially, Chancellor Scott and the rest of the administration hate minorities and want as few to attend this institution as possible. If you're the average UMass student, though, you're white and middle class, and you probably see little effect on you because of this practice. You may have questions about affirmative action like "What is it?" and "Why do we need it?" Don't worry. These questions are totally reasonable and you've got a real live minority to clear it up for you.

You see, affirmative action is the way we lazy minorities take advantage of all the hard-working white people in America. I know, I know... I should have just dedicated myself to my studies when I was in high school, but I had better things to do. I mean, let's face it, there were cars to steal and malt liquor to drink. Christ, do you know how long it takes to gain a profit selling crack? I won't even get into how those baseheads are with money.

Anyway, why would I bother to work when I knew I'd be able to bump a more deserving white male student out of a highly competitive school like UMass?

Oh, and all that stuff about the poor quality of inner-city schools and the impact of racism on the treatment of minority students in the classroom — we made that up. I mean, let's face it. If we were really dedicated to making it then we'd just grab on to our bootstraps and pull ourselves up. There's no reason why someone who had to attend substandard schools and struggle everyday with poverty and neighborhood violence should get a break. If we do poorly on the SATs it's our fault, right? We just don't want to do the work. Those egghead professors who claim that the SATs are biased in favor of white males and that it doesn't accurately predict college performance are full of it.

Paul Martinez

Racism? Come on. I watched that TV movie about the 60s and all that stuff ended with that Luther-X guy. There's no prejudice in America anymore. It's not as if whites are over 80 percent of the people you see on television or that minorities are portrayed in a stereotypical manner on the rare occasions you do actually see them. Just because realistic, non-pro athlete role-models for minority youth are ignored by the media is no reason to complain.

It's not as if the society we live in is tipped so far in favor of whites that we've come to think that this is the way things should be. Those feminists and minority activists that whine about the glass ceiling and the scarcity of job opportunities for non-whites — pshaw! All they need is a little elbow grease to break out of the culture of poverty. I'd rather stay on welfare. It frees up my day to visit my relatives in prison and go shoplifting.

Of course, thanks to affirmative action I got a fat scholarship to help pay for school. I didn't earn it though. It was just tossed my way because my last name ends in a "z." I don't need the darn thing, to tell you the truth; I have plenty of cash. I just thought it would be fun to take the money away from some poor white kid who worked hard during high school with the dream of becoming a doctor. Hell, I shouldn't even be in college. I can't handle the work. Affirmative action even got me on the Dean's List. I bumped a white guy off.

You know, some nights I like to get together with all my friends and laugh about how we're screwing over the WASPS. My heart bleeds. It really does — for all the minority students who could have had a shot at getting somewhere in life but were screwed by a racist educational system and a nationwide conservative backlash. Don't worry though, by this time next year the number of ALANA students at UMass will be even smaller than it is now. Your precious ears won't be assaulted by so many angry minority voices on campus and the conflicts over this issue will be as remote and distant in your mind as the Goodell takeover. What was that about, anyway?

All hail the new dawn.

Braden asks that whites and blacks join together

By Carla Costa
Collegian Correspondent

During her 50 years as a social justice movement worker, Anne Braden has seen the face of America evolve from the repressed environment of the 50s, to the "anything goes" freedom of the 90's. In her experience, she found women to be the backbone of social movements, such as civil rights, which permanently altered American society.

"Women made what's called the civil rights movement," Braden said. "Women have made every movement that I've ever been involved in, because they do the work, they're committed."

Braden cited Rosa Parks, arrested in December 1955 for refusing to follow segregated seating laws on a public bus, as an example of a woman working behind the scenes of a movement, while men were the ones making the public speeches. Parks, Braden said, had been working as a recruiter for the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), a dangerous job in the early 50s.

She named other women as well, including Ella Baker, who worked as a mentor to students involved in the civil rights cause.

"She encouraged young people, she developed people as leaders. She had this great philosophy that she conveyed to young people," Braden said. "The idea was to develop a politics where leaders are responsible to people instead of people being useful to leaders."

Today, Braden said she has found women at the center of environmental activism because their children are the ones getting sick and dying of toxins. She also noted that in modern society there is more acceptance of women in untraditional roles than there once was and that the women's movement over the last 25 years has definitely changed things.

"If you have women that are going to be leaders of movements for change it doesn't seem as startling that they would be not only in the background, but in the front too," she said.

One problem Braden said she has found within the groups of women working for change, is that white women are unknowingly benefitting from the movement generated by the African-American effort.

"I hear black people say that black people opened the door and white women walked in," said Braden, a white women herself. "They often benefitted more than African-American people did and it's too bad that some of the white women don't realize that."

Braden has found this problem not only among women. She said that whites, male or female, need to work along side people of color in order to make change.

"It's very important for whites to act. A-C-T, act," Braden said. "To break the pattern, to break what sometimes seems like a solid wall of white resistance. To not only change, but nowadays, to admit that it [racism] is still a problem."

She applied this to the current struggle between the University's students and administration over affirmative action. Braden said she would like to see white students joining in with those of color to keep affirmative action. She also said she has some problems with disregarding race but bringing in economic class as a deciding factor for admissions.

"I don't think they should be posed against each other. I think that's really damaging the way it's being presented by the chancellor. I don't think he's doing it with evil motives, but it's putting working class white people against people of color and that's criminal in this day and age," Braden said.

Braden carries this philosophy over into her work with the Kentucky Alliance Against Racist and Political Repression, an organization working to bring black and white together in order create a visible force of people, who are publicly demanding an end to racism in their communities.

"You'll never get rid of all the racism in this country," Braden said, "but we need to build an anti-racist majority and the only way to do that is if people will take a public stand."

Are Islamic women oppressed?

By Lyndsay Crenshaw
Collegian Correspondent

Professor Amina Wadud, an Islamic theologian with emphasis on Qur'anic interpretation, recently spoke on the question of — "Are Women Oppressed in Islam?"

Wadud, a Muslim women, has been involved in the Muslim women's human rights movement for three decades where she has been active on both national and international levels.

Wadud began her lecture pointing out Western assumptions of Muslim women. She said "99.4 percent of what the public knows about Muslim women comes from someone other than a Muslim women herself... these images of Muslim women from the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries continue to prevail into the 21st." She also pointed out the common assumption that Muslim women want to be like Western women and explains that in Muslim society, "... the private role is just as important as the public role and is extremely crucial to society."

Wadud also believes that another common assumption made about Muslim women is that Islamic religion is inherently oppressive to women. Wadud, who advocates a pro-faith feminist perspective, believes that it's not Islam oppressing women but the patriarchal society it's practiced in.

"The Qur'an is the most important phenomenon in Islam... it advocates the just treatment of all people, development of intellect, and its moral objective is the establishment of a just social order," she said.

Wadud also discussed the development of the movement on an international level using the Beijing Women's Conference of 1994 as an example. Wadud said "We [Muslim organizations] did not agree on everything, except that it's necessary to participate on an international level." She continued to explain that there are several different groups of Muslim women who each hold unique philosophies.

Wadud's group, Sisters of Islam, is specific because it chooses to be autonomous of men and focus's on providing women with scholarships, legal reform and welfare.

Other organizations include those which are branches of men's organizations. Wadud believes these are helpful because they teach women leadership roles. She also believes the most unproductive organizations are those with government funding which tend to be rigid and inflexible.

Secular groups also make-up a portion of the Muslim womens' groups, yet leave religion out of their debate. Wadud believes this is a mistake because "Islam is essential to Muslims". The last organization is known as scholar activists. This line of thought involves alternate Qur'anic interpretation with new theories on meanings and practices.

Along with traveling extensively throughout the United States and abroad to present lectures, she has also written a book. Her book entitled Qur'an and Women has been translated into Turkish and Indonesian.

In 1998, Wadud was research associate and visiting lecturer in the women's studies program at the Divinity School of Harvard University. Currently she is teaching at the Virginia Commonwealth University in the department of philosophy and religious studies.

A Choice Matter

BY TIA KIM-CHUAN / COLLEGIAN

Political activist, Marlene Fried talks about women's involvment in the pro-choice movement.

Kathleen Cammarata

Recently the twenty-sixth anniversary of Roe vs. Wade — the case that gives women the right to reproductive rights — was celebrated. In honor of this event which legalized abortion, it seemed reasonable to meet with pro-choice activists to discuss the issue.

Driving to my first interview and first assignment for the Women's Issues section of the Daily Collegian, I was filled with emotion. I have heard of Marlene Fried, a political activist for women's rights, and now I was given the opportunity to meet this incredible individual whose strength and commitment towards the movement is unparalleled.

"An estimated 46 percent of all women will have an abortion in their lifetime," Fried said.

When Fried used the term "all women," she's talking about the whole population of women. She is not referring to one race, class, or religion. There is no one type of woman that has an abortion. They are women we might know, love, and admire. They are functioning individuals in our society. They have a face, a name, an identity.

It is not fair to judge someone because of the personal decisions they have made. We must understand but everyone has to agree with what we choose to do, and as Fried states, "who else is ever going to stand in your shoes?"

And think about it, with all the influences we obtain from our peers, our parents, and from all others, when it comes down to it, what gives someone else the right to decide your future?

"Women should have the right to choose between whether, when and under what circumstances to have children," Fried said.

Fried explained to me that even though a greater part of society is pro-choice, more activism takes place among individuals who are pro-life.

What is so ironic is that these individuals who happen to be pro-life may or may not even know you. What gives someone else the right to inflict their views on you? Someone who doesn't even have any connection with you whatsoever?

"Why should we let someone else decide something that will shape the rest of our lives? So what is that saying about women — that we are not capable of making a choice?" Fried asked.

Fried informed me of recent research that showed how just as many women in the 20s and 30s were having abortions when it was illegal, as they are today. We cannot deny that abortions are taking place, it is a woman's right to choose.

There is not one reason justifying a women's choice, there are millions. It all just depends on the individual. In closing, I would like to pass on a valuable lesson that I have learned from Marlene Fried. Support each other in choice.

My reasoning does not necessarily have to equal yours, but it is the reason I have when I wake up in the morning and when I go to bed at night. Even though I am personally pro-life for myself, I am pro-choice universally. This means me pro-choice, because I realize I will never walk in the shoes of another. So talk about it with friends and peers. Get the word out. Support women's right to choose.

What a woman is

I want to be a stripper. I really do. It would be good to do it just once. One night. Of course I probably won't, but why do people think I would be degrading women if I did take it all off while dozens of pitiful boys throw their money at me? At least it would be a job where a woman wouldn't be making 70 cents to every man's dollar. And every one of those suckers' dollars in my g-string would be one dollar less in a man's pocket and one more in a woman's.

If I choose to do it on my own free will with a healthy mental and emotional state and it's what makes me happy then why not? Lord knows it pays better than being a reporter.

But maybe my modesty would get the best of me when the music starts, (bow chicka bow bow) so what if I, dare I say it on a college campus, became a housewife?! I could just take my degree in journalism and admire it while I vacuum the rug and make the kid's lunches. That's it. I'll dedicate myself to properly raising the next generation, I'll be part psychiatrist, nutritionist, doctor, chauffeur and chef.

Jill Carroll

But oh! What a waste of my hard earned piece of paper.

Everyone is so proud of themseves, and their degrees and "enlightenment," but give me a break. What's so enlightened about telling people they can't choose occupations and lifestyles that make them happy?

If you want to get buck naked while wrapped around a brass pole or keep it all on while climbing the corporate ladder, I say go for it. You're the only one who has to live your life so do what makes you happy.

But of course this only applies to women who have the option to choose what they want to do in life.

Choices are what allows freedom. Prisoners are without choices, victims are without choices and what a coincidence that choice is just what conservatives are trying to take away from women.

For the lucky individuals who have choices, here's some rules to live by to help make the right ones. Keep in mind this is not an Ann Landers column.

- The secret to success in a career is, (drum roll please), doing what you get paid for. I know, not mind-blowing but it's surprising how many people don't do it. Showing up on time, doing your job thoroughly and not calling in sick will do wonders for a career. Bosses do backflips when they have reliable, productive employees.
- Read.
- If the person you love makes you feel guilty, bad about yourself or powerless that isn't love. Two words: Get out.
- Read.
- Remember, size 12 is normal.
- Read.
- If a professor is explaining why women can't be CEOs, mathematicians, or in the military, challenge it. There may be women in the room who believe what the old wind-bag is saying.
- Read.
- Remember, you only live once, so eat chocolate. The world's supply is rumored to be exhausted in the next 20 years so stockpile now.
- And maybe I forgot to mention it but, read.
- For God's sake turn off the TV. Why waste time just to get told to buy things, look pretty and be submissive?

And what does it take to be pretty? To be feminine?

It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure it out, anything that makes you weaker.

High heels, passivity, excessive thinness, a soft voice, avoiding conflict, approval seeking, pantyhose, playing dumb, waiting your turn, stop me anytime here but this looks likes a formula for failure.

How seriously can someone, who is teetering around in three inch heels, a mini skirt and talking in a mouse-like voice, be taken? All the things that are qualities of beauty in women are also qualities of powerlessness.

But beauty is the ultimate goal because it's the primary criteria women are judged on.

Let's summarize. To be beautiful you have to be thin (not some muscular hulk), agreeable and not too out spoken. And you have to be beautiful to be loved. Is it just me or is their something psychotic about the whole thing?

Men have to be strong, fast, smart, aggressive and assertive, to be attractive. Funny but last time I checked those are traits that might get you somewhere.

So start up the music and call me a stripper, because I'm a feminist and I'm fixin' to change what being a woman is.

Hear this, women of UMass, come tell us how you feel

What are Women's Issues? Good question. I can only tell you what my issues are as a woman. I can't attempt to speak for all of womankind, but what we're all really searching for is the perfect pair of pumps.

Of course I'm kidding, but that leads me into my point. We have come so far as women — our voices are strong and leave an indelible print on the world. We've made it clear that we don't care if you open the door for us or not; just don't slam it in our face.

What could feminism possibly need or want? We need humor. Because it is our humor, our capacity to care for one another, that sustains us. Our laughter has always been more powerful than our fists and sometimes even our words.

Julie Fialkow

Women, when they are at their best, bring light into a room. At our worst, we tend to hide in the shadows of the light that we ourselves have created.

As women we are all too familiar with that critical voice which squashes our ambitions and makes us stray from our intuition. I don't think any self-help book in the world will kill this nasty ol' voice. Meditation, scented candles, and chocolate cake can remedy our insecurities, but only temporarily. My prescription again is humor. Maybe this voice that tells us: we're not good enough, our butts jiggle too much, that we are useless without a boyfriend or girlfriend; maybe instead of trying to eradicate that voice, we can learn to laugh at it until it no longer torments us.

So this is my call to arms. It's not revolutionary, but it is empowering. All we really need to do is use what we have, and not be afraid to flaunt it. I'm not talking about short skirts or special mascara. I'm talking about our minds and our spirits.

Speaking of our minds, for lack of an appropriate segway... write for Women's Issues! Because, well, you could think of a better transition than that and, because you care about women and their contributions to this campus and the world. There are plenty of perks: meet fascinating people, travel to exotic places (Mount Holyoke and Smith to name a few) and all the free water and paper clips you want.

I know how many strong, beautiful, loud, opinionated, and intelligent women there are in the area. My goal for this semester is to have each and every one of you represented on this page. I don't care if you shudder at the word feminist. I don't care if you've lobbied in Congress for women on welfare. This is our space, as UMass women, to express ourselves and reach one another even if we don't always agree.

No experience is necessary or expected — just bring your bad ol' self down to the basement of the Campus Center and talk to me, Julie, or leave a note in my mailbox.

Harvard sexual assault case sparks debate

By Alexia Chiu
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE — Harvard faculty voted yesterday to dismiss a student who admitted sexually assaulting a classmate in a case that sparked a campus debate on whether date rape was treated seriously enough.

Arts and Science faculty members voted to dismiss D. Drew Douglas, rejecting a lesser punishment of withdrawal that would have allowed him to petition for readmission.

Outside where the vote was held, a sign held by one of several hundred student protesters read "Harvard coddles rapists but won't hold survivors' hands."

The dismissal vote — akin to an expulsion — means Douglas could only be readmitted with another vote by the faculty and if new, exculpatory evidence emerged in his case, said Harvard spokeswoman Sally Baker.

Douglas pleaded guilty last year in a criminal court to battery and indecent assault, or improper sexual touching. The school's administrative board investigated and found the then-sophomore had committed an act of rape.

For Douglas, who is under house arrest in Wisconsin, the vote would have little effect because the case already has devastated his life, said his attorney, James L. Sultan.

"His career at Harvard is over," Sultan said. "His name is now being dragged through the mud by people furthering a political agenda."

Students were outraged because the faculty weighed whether to dismiss Douglas — the dean's recommendation — or to force him to withdraw.

THE SEBADOH
Sebadoh
Sub-Pop/Sire

The Sebadoh is a sub-par release from one of the most widely respected indie-rock bands today. Not even reaching the level of musical excellence reached with their last release, Harmacy (which is not even close to their best), Sebadoh seems to be lost here. Lou Barlow's songwriting only manages to get more whiny (if that is possible). And as if Barlow's tunes not reaching their full potential weren't enough, Jason Lowenstein's songs have also taken a turn for the worse.

LIVE WITH FRANK MAROTTA, JR.
Anne O'Meara Heaton
Spill Records

Anne Heaton's talents lend themselves well to live performance. So it is only fitting that she would release a live CD. Recorded at The Bitter End in New York City and Schuba's Tavern in Chicago among other venues, Heaton gives her songs the raw emotion demanded of them that just can't be captured on her studio album. "South Side Boys" opens the album, while Heaton's voice carries the album through all of its 15 tracks, beautifully backed by Marotta's guitar and Heaton's piano. For those of you who caught Heaton and Marotta performance at Blue Moon Cafe in Amherst last Sunday, this disc is a little piece of the performance you can take home with you. If you missed her on Sunday, or would like to hear more from her, she will be at Fire and Water in Northampton tomorrow (Marotta will be present as well.) A- (K.M.)

Oscar snubs a few great actors: Elise, Kudrow and Murray's fine performances go ignored

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

Once again the Oscar nominations for acting this year are slanted towards older, respected actors and shows lead roles and away from the youthful, the understated and the comic. While it's always hard to choose only five nominations for each category, at least five performances bypassed by the Academy deserve special note.

Kimberly Elise, Beloved

In the Oscar-ignored post-slavery drama Beloved, Elise plays Denver, daughter of the iron-willed former slave Sethe and sister of the mysterious, unpredictable Beloved. While Oprah Winfrey sets her jaw as Sethe and Thandie Newton flails and croaks like a demon frog as Beloved, Elise does all the dramatic work, staving off threatening melodrama with calm and gravity, quietly holding things together from beginning to end. Although she's slightly old for the part as written, Elise nails Denver's slow-but-inevitable rise from child to adult as well as Denver's role as both witness to the wounds of history and vessel carrying the memory of slavery into the next generation. The movie finds its most eloquent voice not in the haunting cinematography or even in the twists of the ghost story itself, but rather in the cool, dark globes of Elise's eyes. You can see the story being written in them.

Jim Caviezel and Ben Chaplin, The Thin Red Line

The Thin Red Line was stuffed with performances by big names like Sean Penn and Nick Nolte, not to mention the slew of cameos from Hollywood top guns like George Clooney and John Travolta, but the movie was humped through the war on the backs of the young unknowns, particularly Ben Chaplin and Jim Caviezel. Ben Chaplin plays a soldier with a girlfriend at home, a relationship that is detailed by a series of shiveringly lyrical flashbacks contrasting the middle-American love affair with the rapturous, out-of-control world of the war zone. He plays the "innocent" young man wonderfully, providing a palpable link and contrast between the madness of the war and the naive American soul. Jim Caviezel plays a soldier who is briefly absent without leave and lives with a tribe of native people. Caviezel's character is the optimist and the nature- lover in a flood of pessimists and cynics. It's a tricky role, but Caviezel never seems like a smiley, touchy-feely idiot. Instead he gives the character (and the movie) an unforced patience and sense of wonder that helps all the poetic inner monologues and shots of plants and light seem more wise than pretentious. Without Caviezel, the movie doesn't work.

Lisa Kudrow, The Opposite of Sex

Up until recently, Lisa Kudrow has been known only for her work as the shallowest character on "Friends": Phoebe, the loopy, "mystical" blonde, which is why her work in The Opposite of Sex is such a revelation. It's clear that Phoebe's dumb blonde routine is a constraint on Kudrow's talent. In The Opposite of Sex she plays the anti-Phoebe, a tough, intelligent, ungodly cynical busybody. She delivers her lines like she was driving icicles into peoples' eyes. But more than just playing an amazingly unlikable character with great intensity and flawless timing, Kudrow also manages to make the character human. When the busybody finds love (sort of) it's neither out of place or particularly heart-warming, it tastes just as bitter as the rest of her life. It's a testament to Kudrow's talent that, by the end of the movie, her character's bitter life is not sickening, like milk gone bad, but is instead bracing, like a strong cup of coffee.

Bill Murray, Rushmore

Bill Murray's facial expression rarely changes from the gently sloppy, tired, droopy look that has served him brilliantly in smarter-than-the-world roles in such movies as Ghostbusters, Stripes and Wild Things. He was a hero simply because he didn't look like he cared. But he's not just a one-note actor, as he proved in Groundhog Day and again in this year's nerdy, curiously involving romantic comedy Rushmore. Murray plays a rich, lonely man who falls in love with a grade-school teacher. Gone is the cool, removed comic and in his place Murray gives us a man who puts up a cool exterior not because he doesn't care, but because he doesn't want to let any emotions out or in. Murray never cries or really complains but he doesn't need to. You can read his character's heart in the tiniest inflections of his voice, the smallest change in the angle of his head. His acting is careful to the point of being minimalistic and brilliantly serves the movie's theme of the freedom of innocence versus the restraint of experience. One of Murray's finest scenes takes place in a hospital elevator and involves him drinking alcohol from a soda can and lighting a fresh cigarette unaware that he already holds one in his lips. It's an incredible feat to express such a complete daze like that without going for the cheap laugh, but Murray pulls it off with the disarming ease of a diver disappearing into the pool without a splash. His performance in Rushmore is one of the most crushing, dead-on portraits of loneliness in American movies.

mOthertounge wants writers

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

For all of you budding undergraduate poets and fiction writers out there, there is a large venue for your work right here on the UMass-Amherst campus. All of these artistic and literary journals are edited and produced by various student organizations, and they are a great resource for raw, young creativity.

mOthertongue is a multilingual arts and poetry journal published through the Department of Comparative Literature here at UMass. Now working on their sixth volume, mOthertongue will be accepting submissions until March 30, 1999.

Editor and undergraduate student, Kenan Gündüz explained that "mOthertongue promotes true cross-cultural exchange. It offers a forum for students to interact through the mediums of poetry and art, where the universal archetypes of human experience offer true connections among various cultures and ethnicities."

mOthertongue is edited by comparative literature students. Submissions may be brought to 303 South College. mOthertongue is published annually during the spring semester.

Jabberwocky, the literary journal of the UMass English Club, is now accepting both poetry and short fiction.

"Although run by the English Club, Jabberwocky provides a creative outlet for the entire undergraduate body," explained Secretary/Treasurer Timothy Ostrander.

Although started in 1995, Jabberwocky has remained unpublished for the past two years. To compensate for this dormancy, two editions of Jabberwocky will be published this year — one containing the submissions from the past two years and another showcasing the submissions from the 1998-99 academic year. The first is set to come out sometime this week.

The deadline for this year's journal is April 1, 1999. All work should include an index card with the author's name, address and telephone, and the titles of the submitted work. The author's name should not appear on the work. Fiction submissions are limited to approximately five pages single spaced. Submissions should be placed under the door of the English Club office in Bartlett Hall, room 282.

Spectrum is one of the oldest journals here at UMass. The goal of this magazine is to promote fiction, nonfiction, poetry, art, and photography within the Five College community. With each annual publication, Spectrum attempts to create a balanced array of student works.

Spectrum is comprised entirely of student volunteers from the UMass Amherst and Five-College community. All submissions are reviewed anonymously. The Spectrum office is located at 406E in the Student Union at UMass. You do not have to be on staff to submit work. All are encouraged to submit their art, photography, poetry, and prose. Visual art may be submitted in original form, though reproductions in the form of prints and slides are preferred. All literary work must be copies of the originals, typed and double-spaced.

The newest edition to the undergraduate literary scene, Short Cuts, is solely devoted to short stories written by undergraduate students. The seeds for Short Cuts were planted in Comparative Literature 121H — International Short Story, Fiction, and Film, taught by Thérèse Pasquale.

Coursework for Comp. Lit 121 includes a final project — for each student to write his/her own story. Pasquale explained that this is generally considered by students to be the high point of the class. "It did not entirely surprise me when, at the end of the semester last fall [1997], the students themselves raised the idea of collecting the stories and publishing them," she said.

Short Cuts will consist of 10-12 selected works by UMass undergrads. The panel of student editors has received a number of submissions already, but will still consider stories that are submitted as soon as possible.

Submissions must be typed and no longer than eight single-spaced pages. Only the title should appear on the first page of the story, and it should be accompanied by a cover sheet with the author's name, address, e-mail address, phone number, ID number, and title of the story. The best of the submissions will be selected for publication and made available in April 1999.

conventional flow of rap music. Forget beats for a minute, Prince Paul has an entire resume of pure innovation. On the Gravediggaz classic debut 6 Feet Deep, he introduced us to a variety of horrifying, eerie beats, which proved to be the ideal gloom for the twisted flows of RZArecta and company. Dr. Octagon was even more experimental, and although the album received "rave" reviews from a certain crowd, hip- hop heads eventually acknowledged its alternative appeal, classifying it as another of Paul's weird sensations.

Although the Prince was initially recognized for pioneering Stetsasonic, his early work with De La solidified his stature as a masterful music technition, fusing break beats with brilliant loops from rock 'n' roll, jazz and blues.

Now he has returned to the circuit, carrying an entirely fresh concept with him. Imagine, a complete 35 track, audio cinematic album, coupled with Prince Paul beats and an all- star cast of lyricists. In essence, a hip-hopra (not to be confused with Bounty Killer's concierto with the Fugees), a rap musical packed with a realistic plot and the profound synthesis of dialogue and song.

A Prince Among Thieves is the story of an aspiring emcee who turns to the crack game to raise funds for his demo. Tariq (played by Breeze) is the protagonist in the tale, along with his main man True (Sha), who initiates him to the illegal life. As they dabble in the viscous world of drug sales, they encounter various mis-adventures and exaggerated character types playing hilarious (and often typical) roles: Everlast plays NYPD officer O'Mally Bitchkowski; Kool Keith acts as a weapon salesman and ex-Marine sergeant discharged for sexual misconduct; and Chris Rock stars as a needy crack head (what a stretch.)

Musically the album shines on several slickly produced tracks, most notably "Macula's Theory" featuring a lyrically rejuvenated Big Daddy Kane. "Handle Your Time," performed by prison inmates Sadat X and Xzibit is 'scellent as well. Without spoiling the story, skits and interludes, this is a thorough and revolutionary effort that entertains you with the exuberance of an action movie.

Prince Paul has indeed done it again, and even though A Prince Among Thieves will not be regarded as a 'classic' it is a groundbreaking

Mad Professor vs. Scratch Perry

By Neal Gay
Collegian Correspondent

LEE "SCRATCH" PERRY with MAD PROFESSOR
Pearl Street Nightclub
March 7

NORTHAMPTON — There comes a time in every musician's life when they reach their creative peak and fall into a gyre of less than notable musical efforts. It happened to Paul Weller after the Jam and Frank Black after the Pixies. Two great bands with two ingenious songsters. Both mere still make records and perform, but their glory days are past them, their flame extinguished with a new tide of popular music. I can still listen to Paul Weller swoon with the Jam, but his solo efforts are, to be frank, insipid sagas, left over from years past.

The same can be said for Lee "Scratch" Perry, who came to Pearl Street on Sunday with the Mad Professor and his Robotic Band. The Mad Professor is at the top of his game, creating his own brand of narcotically mind-numbingly dub- reggae. Lee Perry, the very definition of an idol, has past his prime. Perry, notable for working with such acts as Bob Marley and the Wailers, and The Clash, as well as fronting his own rocksteady group, the Upsetters, was a major disappointment, more comedy than show.

The opening act, John Brown's Body, played an incredible set of straight-forward reggae. Relying heavily on tunes from their new album, "Among Them," on Shanachie Records, these guys were a welcome relief to the cold New England night, making me wish I was on a warm beach with the near capacity crowd rather than in the cold and drafty concert hall in Northampton. A seven-piece outfit from Boston, John Brown's Body were meant to "warm up the crowd for Lee Perry." They did much more than that.

To be honest, Lee Perry seemed to be a marijuana causality, having smoked a few too many pounds in his time. I couldn't get into him. The music was pounding and methodical just the way dub should be, but Perry distracted from that by reciting the alphabet and continuing to say, "rub-a-dub-dub (insert any word or series of words to what or who is in the tub)." The high point of his set, if you could call it a high point, was his, 'Dub Those Crazy Baldheads,' but only because Perry made sense for about four minutes.

Reggae will never die; it transcends genres, attracting skinheads and hippies, middle-aged professionals and hipsters. That's the beauty of it — music so simple and melodious that anyone can listen to it and not be offended. They don't necessarily like it, but it doesn't make their eardrums bleed. This show deafened me, and not because of its volume. It was boring and cacophonic. It hurts to have to say that, Perry being a semi-hero of mine, but I feel obligated to be honest. This brand of honesty hurts.

Professor receives threats from Pumpkins fans

The Smashing Pumkins are being sued for playing too loud.

By Dom Yanchunas
Associated Press

TRENTON, N.J. — A Princeton University music professor suing Smashing Pumpkins over their concert's noise level has received raucous feedback from fans of the alternative rock band. Peter Jeffery, a Gregorian chant expert, said yesterday he has received nasty e-mails and telephone calls calling him "a jerk" and "stupid."

"You join the ranks of the cretins who sue McDonald's for serving coffee too hot," reads one e-mail from a Smashing Pumpkins fan in Liverpool, England. "You should be ashamed of yourself."

Jeffery, who is suing the band members, concert promoters and an ear plug manufacturer, says he suffered hearing damage while attending a 1997 Smashing Pumpkins concert with his 12-year-old son.

The band has declined comment on the lawsuit.

Jeffery, 45, said the damage is permanent and has affected his professional work because it is difficult for him to focus on music he is studying.

Jeffery said about 20 people have either phoned or e-mailed him since news reports of the lawsuit surfaced late last week. "I can't believe the lawsuit is true," said a message on a telephone voice mail. "It's the most ridiculous, stupid thing I've ever heard of. You probably just hate your job... It so frustrated me I had to track you down because I think it's just total crap."

After dropping a tough 5-4 decision against Cornell at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse on Saturday, Mike McKeefrey and the men's lacrosse team will look to regroup against Fairfield this weekend.

Offerman and Rapp shine

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) — Jose Offerman sure has been hitting like Mo Vaughn this March.

Offerman hit his third home run of the spring, but the Boston Red Sox lost to the Montreal Expos 6-5 on Monday when Tomas De La Rosa homered in the 10th inning.

Offerman, who signed a $26 million, four-year contract after Vaughn left the Red Sox to sign with Anaheim, said it would be unfair to expect him to replace Vaughn's production.

"I don't have those kinds of numbers," said Offerman, who has never hit more than seven homers in a season during his seven years in the major leagues. "There's no reason for people to expect those kinds of numbers from me. I've just been making good contact."

Offerman went 3-for-4 and scored a pair of runs to pace the Red Sox. Mike Stanley, playing just his second game of the spring, hit a solo homer and Troy O'Leary added a solo home run.

Orlando Cabrera and Mike Mordecai each hit solo home runs for the Expos, who played very few of their regular players.

Montreal starter Carl Pavano, acquired in a November 1997 deal that sent Pedro Martinez to the Red Sox, allowed two runs and four hits in three innings.

"It was a lot different than when I faced them in Fenway (last year)," Pavano said.

Stanley, who hadn't played since the opener due to a sore hamstring, homered in his first at-bat leading off the second inning.

O'Leary was just 1-for-12 before his homer gave Boston a 3-1 lead in the fourth. Offerman's homer retied it at 4-all in the eighth.

Boston's Bob Hamelin had a pinch RBI single to send the game to extra innings.

Jose Bautista got the win and Keith Evans had a save, while Chris Cumberland took the loss.

Red Sox pitcher works through his bad Rapp

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) — A change in Boston right-hander Pat Rapp's thinking may have ended his wildness.

Rapp, who struggled with his control last season with Kansas City, pitched three scoreless innings yesterday's loss to the Expos.

"They like a lot of first-pitch strikes here," said Rapp, who didn't walk a batter for the second straight appearance. "In the past, I hadn't been a guy to do that. The stats show you're successful when you get ahead of hitters."

Rapp, who threw thirty of his 50 pitches for strikes, only fell behind three of the 11 batters he faced in his second outing of the spring.

Last year, Rapp walked 107 hitters in 188 innings.

"I felt very strong today," Rapp said (yesterday.) "It took a couple of innings to get my curveball over the plate, though."

Coming off a 12-13 season with the Royals, Rapp was signed Jan. 11 to provide a proven fifth starter in Boston's veteran rotation. He is expected to start behind Pedro Martinez, Bret Saberhagen, Tim Wakefield and newcomer Mark Portugal.

Underpaid coaches settle with NCAA

By Dana Fields
Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Underpaid college coaches who successfully sued the NCAA are finally getting a big bonus: $54.5 million.

The governing body of college sports agreed yesterday to pay the amount to about 2,000 Division I assistant coaches whose salary was capped at $12,000 for an academic year.

The so-called restricted-earnings rule lasted three years (1992-95) before a judge struck it down. The coaches and the NCAA had been fighting over a settlement ever since.

"This association-wide nightmare is over," Charles Wethington, NCAA executive committee chairman, said in announcing an end to years of expensive litigation.

The settlement comes two days after another NCAA setback. A federal judge in Philadelphia threw out the organization's minimum test-score requirement for freshmen student-athletes, saying it was unfair to blacks. The NCAA is fighting the ruling.

In the settlement, the NCAA must still decide how much each of the 302 Division I schools will pay. Officials of many schools have criticized the organization for not settling the case sooner. The schools' financial pain could be cushioned by about $22 million the NCAA will make over the next three years through cost-cutting measures, executive director Cedric Dempsey said. But the schools would still be responsible for the balance of the settlement.

Dempsey would not speculate on a school-by-school allocation of the damages. He said a subcommittee that is already studying the question has heard two "extremes" — one to divide the total equally among all Division I schools, the other tied to distribution of revenue based on school size.

"It is not likely the subcommittee's allocation plan will embrace either of these solutions," said Dempsey, adding that the NCAA wants to decide before the organization's next fiscal year begins in September.

The settlement now awaits a judge's approval, which will clear the way for the coaches to submit claims.

They won't split the money evenly, however. Instead, the amount they receive will be based on what they made under the cap and what their schools would otherwise have paid them, said Dennis Cross, a Kansas City-based lawyer for the coaches.

It will probably be months before checks are sent out to the coaches, many of whom are no longer in college sports, he said. "We won our major point, which was that the rule was unlawful and was repealed. And those who were damaged by it will be recompensed," Cross said.

The restricted-earnings rule was adopted as a cost-cutting move by near-unanimous vote of Division I schools in 1991 and took effect in August 1992. The rule capped salaries for entry-level assistants in various sports, excluding football, at $12,000 for the academic year and $4,000 for the summer.

Coaches filed three lawsuits that were later consolidated into one, and the NCAA lifted the rule in 1995 after a federal judge in Kansas City, Kan., ruled that the organization violated antitrust laws. An appellate court upheld that ruling, and the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear the case.

UNC wary of Weber St.

By David Droschak
Associated Press

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — Quick, undersized teams can give North Carolina problems, meaning Weber State is capable of some trouble in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

The Big Sky Conference champions don't have a starter taller than 6-foot-7. The third-seeded Tar Heels are one of the nation's tallest teams.

"The quick team always has the advantage, especially if you've got a lot of big people on the court," North Carolina point guard Ed Cota said yesterday before the Tar Heels flew to Seattle. "You can always use your quickness to run up and down the floor to wear a team down. Hopefully, we can overcome that."

The two teams meet in the West Regional tomorrow.

"It gives us problems, but at the same time it gives them problems," forward Ademola Okulaja said Thursday. "Overall, I think it will give them more problems if we run our plays right and execute and get the ball inside. Hopefully, we'll overpower them under the boards."

Coach Bill Guthridge said a pair of satellite dishes installed at the Smith Center years ago came in handy late Sunday when he and his staff dug up four taped games on 14th-seeded Weber State (24-7), a squad the Tar Heels knew little about.

"I think they've got a couple of future NBA players," Guthridge said yesterday of 6-6 forward Harold Arceneaux and guard Eddie Gill. "That conference has a good history (in the NCAAs). They certainly like to break, but they can run a set offense too. They start three guards, and if you count Arceneaux, they have four guards. So they are going to present matchup problems for us."

The Tar Heels (24-9) are making their 25th straight NCAA tournament appearance but are coming off a 23-point loss to Duke in the Atlantic Coast Conference title game.

Guthridge said his team is upbeat despite the lopsided loss, which could translate into a potential loss of momentum heading into the postseason.

"We lost to the No. 1 team in the country, so we can't dwell on that game. We just have to bounce back," Cota said.

"Losses really bother me, but if you look back on it we had two of our best games in beating Georgia Tech and Maryland," Guthridge said of the ACC tourney. "It's hard to judge how you play against Duke because they are so good."

North Carolina, seeking a 25-win season for the 15th time in the last 18 years, has one huge advantage — NCAA experience. The Tar Heels have won at least one game in the tournament 18 straight years and been to the Final Four each of the last two years. "I don't care about the Final Four no more. I want to win it," Okulaja said. "It's nice to say you've been to the Final Four, then the next year again you said you were to the Final Four. But both times people say, 'What happened?' I don't want them to say, 'What happened?' I want to say I've won the whole thing and here is my ring."

series between Maine and UMass. Blanchard simply said, "I don't like to give predictions. I don't want to put a jinx on our team, but we are going to go in there with the best mentality. We have got a group of confident guys in there, not overconfident, but we're ready."

Coach Mallen finished by talking about not only what he hopes Blanchard will be able to do in this year's playoffs, but also the kind of senior year Blanchard can have:

"He came in here like I did and we all did, and that is to make UMass a winning program. We all knew that it would very difficult to begin with, but left is a winner and he wants success, and he won't settle for second best. He's seen some disappointment in the first couple of years, left's the guy who knows his best is ahead of him and that he can really have a great senior year ahead of him. As a result of believing in the program, he will soon see the success he dreamed about."

Avalanche win over Colorado, 3-2 in overtime

By Joseph White
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sandis Ozolinsh scored 19 seconds into overtime yesterday night as the Colorado Avalanche, winning for the second straight time without three of their top stars, dampened the Washington Capitals' playoff hopes with a 3-2 victory.

Ozolinsh, with space in the left circle, took a pass from Valeri Kamensky and beat goaltender Olaf Kolzig over the left shoulder. It was Ozolinsh's third goal of the season.

Chris Drury, a contender for the league's leading rookie scorer, and Adam Deadmarsh scored in the second period as the Avalanche improved to 5-1 on their road trip even though their lineup was missing goaltender Patrick Roy, leading scorer Peter Forsberg and recent acquisition Theoren Fleury for the second straight game. Roy has the flu and Forsberg is nursing a sprained elbow — both are day-to-day — while Fleury is out indefinitely with a sprained knee. Still, the Avalanche beat Pittsburgh 3-1 Sunday without the trio and are unbeaten in 12 of their last 13 road games.

The Capitals weren't exactly full strength, either, in a game that featured two of the top three teams in man-games lost due to injuries. Among the recent additions are Joe Juneau, who is suffering headaches, and Steve Konowalchuk, who has a concussion. The Capitals did get back defenseman Brendan Witt, who had missed 15 games with a sprained wrist.

Andrei Nikolishin scored in the game's first minute and Michal Pivonka early in the third for the Capitals, who lost ground in their daunting attempt to climb to the eighth and final playoff berth in the Eastern Conference.

Craig Billington, who had played well subbing for Roy, nearly gave away the game when he gave away the puck and allowed the Capitals to tie it in the third. Nursing a 2-1 lead, Billington was well in front of the crease when he cleared the puck straight to Pivonka in the left circle. Billington scrambled back to the net trying to recover, but Pivonka had already fired home his fifth goal of the season with 17:08 remaining in the game.

Deadmarsh scored the game's best goal, skating down the left wing around defenseman Sergei Gonchar and firing over a diving Kolzig to give the Avalanche a 2-1 lead with just 6.1 seconds left in the second period.

The Capitals scored just 45 seconds into the game when Andrei Nikolishin's long-range slap shot beat Billington to the left. Washington seemed poised to build on the lead a few minutes later when they had a two-man advantage for 1:50, but they played the five-on-three cautiously and took just two shots.

It takes more than winter to deter avid Mt. bikers

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

With the onset of the region's longest season, most mountain bikers have the common sense to shelve their bicycles in favor of more practical winter sports.

The truly hardcore gear-mashers, however, look to the changing seasons as a time to test their mettle at a truly awesome and dangerous challenge: winter mountain biking.

Once the snow flies through the Pioneer Valley, the once- trodden trails are reduced to barren white runways snaking through the countryside. The bitter cold of a typical Western Massachusetts winter is usually enough to deter even the most devoted rider. But with the advent of new technology in thermal and moisture-wicking fabrics, cyclists now have the ability to overcome even the harshest weather.

The next, and undoubtedly biggest challenge, is the terrain.

Any riders who dabble in winter trail riding will be pleasantly surprised to find snow among their biggest allies. The fluffy white stuff actually provides comparable traction with considerably less friction resistance than dirt. And while a tightly-packed summer singletrack is truly a joy to blaze through, there is an inherently spiritual feel to bombing down a snow-covered lane.

In a sport that's constantly bombarded with criticism concerning over-aggressive bikers and the unnatural trail erosion they create, this is probably the only instance when leaving your tracks isn't only a blast, it actually improves riding conditions.

The problem is that where the trail-blazer finds virgin snow to thrash, he will soon enough discover his most bitter enemy: ice.

Riding a bicycle on ice is quite possibly the most difficult maneuver in recreational sports. Even the most experienced cyclist must employ every ounce of balance and control possible to remain upright. If the rider's center of gravity isn't maintained exactly over the bike, it's "lights out." And once the wheels kick out and bike and biker begin their slow-motion descent to the earth, the real nightmare begins.

A typical mountain bike wipe-out dumps the rider into the underbrush that lines the trail. Most bikers get used to this occurence, and learn to respect it rather than fear it. (Some riders even look forward to the few moments of post-crash rest.)

Ice is an entirely different animal. Whereas knowledgeable trail riders can "steer" their way through a fall to avoid things like rocks, an ice-induced fall doesn't afford that opportunity. Ice crashes are always fast, hard, and extremely painful. The sensation is comparable to falling off a jungle gym onto cement.

So how does an otherwise enthused cold-weather cyclist avoid this sinister setback?

As in alpine skiing, the secret is choosing the best line on which to descend. The wise trail rider knows that ice is most likely to lurk in areas of run-off, such as the gullies and waterbars that typically traverse a trail. So the key is to keep your wheels on the highest part of the track, avoiding any depressions or low spots.

Another important practice is to watch for breaks in the canopy above the path. Ironically, icing up is bound to occur in places where sporadic sun reaches the trail, thus turning otherwise friendly snow into a deadly slick.

Once the adverse terrain changes of winter are mastered, the snow biker must now account for the effects that the cold has upon the bike itself. Tires should be somewhat over-inflated prior to setting out, as the contraction caused by lower temperatures will render them soft over time. Also, riders who use oil-dampened suspension can expect less responsiveness from their bikes during winter, as the cold raises the viscosity of the oil. An easy remedy for this is to simply tune your shocks to a softer setting, even if it makes riding more difficult initially. After about 30 minutes in the cold, they should stiffen back up.

With spring seemingly just around the corner, time is running out to experience the joys and perils of winter mountain biking. Those who do can expect non only an intense rush, but a new found appreciation for the state's most unpopular season.

Holyfield stands behind prediction about Lewis fight

By Ed Schuyler Jr.
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Evander Holyfield has no second thoughts about his prediction for his heavyweight title fight with Lennox Lewis. "I'm still holding to the truth," he said. "The truth is I'm going to knock him out in the third round."

The 36-year-old IBF-WBA champion, who made the prediction a couple of weeks ago, is the 6-5 favorite to keep his title and add Lewis' WBC championship at Madison Square Garden on Saturday night. "I'm not asking anybody here to believe that," Holyfield said of his boast after training yesterday at the Church Street Gym near the tip of Manhattan. "I'm not asking anybody to write that, but you can write it now or write it later."

Holyfield said his prediction has nothing to do with Lewis, "except that Lewis is going to be the opponent. Everybody who fights me has courage and heart and skills."

"Preposterous," Lewis said of Holyfield's prediction. Asked if he would make a prediction, Lewis, who worked out yesterday afternoon at The Theater in the Garden complex, replied, "Yes, I'm predicting he will not knock me out in the third round."

Pro hoops active as predicted trade becomes possible

The ax has begun to fall in the NBA, even though Dave Cowens technically resigned from his position at the Hornets' helm citing irreconcilable differences. A closer look would reveal that he was forced to step down after demanding a higher salary in the midst of a crisis–like situation in Charlotte.

Sanford Appell
DIS

Paul Silas, who was probably deserving of the head coaching job years ago, will likely step in on an interim basis. Silas appears to be the logical man to guide the flees because of the bond he formed with Derrick Coleman as an assistant with the Nets.

In the meantime, Charlotte is still trying to work out the kinks in a deal to move sharp shooter Glen Rice to the Lakers in return for Eddie Jones and Elden Campbell.

The deal looks proper on paper, but L.A. will certainly consider the potentially detrimental effects of losing the equally classy and talented player that Jones is.

While it would be hard to complain about Kurt Rambis' 6–0 track record as of press time, the team should ponder why they moved Nick Van Exel if they were going to pull the plug on Del Harris anyway.

As was suggested two weeks ago in this forum, Gregg Popovich appears to be actively attempting to split up the Twin Towers in the wake of San Antonio's 9–8 start.

However, it seems David Robinson is the pivot man that Popovich is ready to part with.

Both Portland and New Jersey (sound familiar?) have jumped into the fray, with the red–hot Blazers only proposing to send Rasheed Wallace to Texas for the Admiral.

The Nets have mentioned several pairings including Kendall Gill and Chris Gatling, or Gill and Jayson Williams.

Robinson is clearly still one of the top five centers in the league, so the Wallace offer is not only preposterous, but downright insulting.

The combo of Williams and Gatling may do the trick for the Spurs, but Jersey would be foolish to make the deal, because their front–line would be much too soft to play the rugged Eastern Conference style of play.

Speaking of Portland, however, it might be time to 'fess up that they are much better than originally expected to be — at least in my eyes.

At 13–5, they are legitimately rolling, as evidenced by the 40–point massacre over my predicted World Champion Houston Rockets on Sunday.

Not to fret, we're still hoping for that late–season/playoff collapse, once the team realizes that they all detest each other and that their point guard used to play for Toronto.

Aside from Portland, the biggest surprise of the young season may be the Philadelphia 76ers.

"Above .500" has not been heard regarding the cagers in Philly for many years, but with Larry Brown calling the signals, it really should not be that much of a shocker. The guy simply wins wherever he coaches, even with the Clippers and Jersey (before resigning around playoff time in 1983).

The only question concerning Brown's current rotation regards Tim Thomas who has been inexplicably playing off the bench.

Thomas has the potential to be one of the most explosive players in the league — the next "human highlight reel" if you will — but he won't be by sitting next to the water cooler.

Pat Riley has a chance to solidify his place amongst the all–time greats in coaching if he can snag a title with this year's Heat.

After making a living off the laurels of Magic Johnson, who could have coached the Lakers himself, Riley has yet to earn even one post–Magic title.

With the field wide open in the East, and the Heat playing Riley's brand of hardball to a tee, they may have a chance to make some serious noise once Jamal Mashburn and Vashon Lenard return to the ranks.

One major roadblock for Riley and Co. appears to be their Floridian counterparts, the Orlando Magic, who stand high atop the Atlantic Division now.

A long–awaited battle of the Hardaway's, Tim and Penny could highlight a potentially thrilling interstate conference final come May.

Minnesota is playing solid ball, but rumblings about Stephon Marbury being traded before the deadline continue to arise, and that can only be damaging to their success until the cut–off date passes.

Marbury continues to insist that Minnesota does not agree with his late–night lifestyle and furthermore, that $120 million man Kevin Garnett doesn't get many endorsements there... poor guys.

Blanchard shines late in season

By Paul Teves

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

As UMass returns to the Hockey East Playoffs this year, they will be relying heavily on the play of Jeff Blanchard, who leads the team in scoring.

Way back in October, on Hockey East Media Day, the Massachusetts (12–19–2, 8–14–2 Hockey East) hockey team was picked by the Hockey East Media to finish dead last in the league behind teams like Northeastern, Merrimack and UMass–Lowell, but the Minutemen proved the media and Hockey East wrong by finishing the regular season tied for sixth points wise, and seventh with the tie breaker. A big part of the successful season has been junior alternate captain Jeff Blanchard.

Blanchard has had a great season for the Minutemen. The junior forward from Stouffville, Ont. is the team's leading scorer with 25 points, nine goals and 16 assists, which puts him in second on the team in goals, while his 16 helpers lead the team.

"Obviously during the course of the season you're going to run into slumps and there will be times when you're playing a little below your level, but you just have to work through those things. Fortunately, I did rebound and hopefully I can carry on in the playoffs," Blanchard said.

The Ontario native is coming off his best game of his career at UMass, burying two goals and tallying an assist on the night. His two goal performance and his three point night marks the second time Blanchard has accomplished this feat in a Minutemen uniform in both categories.

"We played a solid game up at Merrimack and we have won five out of six, and we have won our last two road games. This stretch run has been real good for us," Blanchard said, referring to his career game and the current UMass streak.

The Minutemen have recently played well on the road. They have won two games against UMass–Lowell and Merrimack, while they lost two one–goal games to Providence and the River Hawks.

"We have a great road mentality right now, guys really know how to play in the small rinks, which Maine (UMass' next opponent) has. They have a small barn up there. We have to be prepared for a lot of hitting and banging. Playoffs mean a new season. We have to get ready for that," Blanchard said.

"He's been working real hard, he's been logging a lot of ice time, (more) than any one of our forwards. He's got great speed and offensive ability, but I think the other night he played a real honest game — just real good in the penalty kill and real good in the defensive zone — and then the puck would just come out to him and he buried them," Mallen said. "I think it was the best game he has played since he's been here. No better time to get hot then this time of the season. I hope that carries into the playoffs."

Blanchard has done a great job throughout his career finding the open man and creating plays. Although Blanchard has been a great goal–scorer, his ability to see the ice has definitely been one of his better attributes. He has collected 36 assists over his three years at UMass, and has improved on his totals each season.

"Combination of both. You don't make the play by yourself and guys around you are making plays too. We have gotten contributions from a lot of guys... It's not about numbers. We have had a lot of guys who have contributed in a lot of different ways... In regards to my assists, that is the style I need to play for our team be successful, and I'll do whatever it takes," Blanchard said.

Blanchard has shown his leadership skills for his young team by showing by example how to work through tough times. He did so by working through a midseason slump. He has also done it over the years by playing in all of the Minutemen's games (100) during the last three years.

"You only play 33 games a year, so each night you have to be ready. Each weekend we play two games — sometimes one — and we did a great job of persevering through some tough times. Those times when pucks aren't bouncing for you, you need to persevere through that and we have shown [that we can do] that by putting together a great stretch run," Blanchard said.

The Minutemen have been led by their juniors, but Blanchard has led the team on the ice with his quickness, tough competitiveness, his scoring and playmaking ability and has allowed the younger Minutemen to mature and improve throughout the course of the campaign.

"I think that Dean Stork was clearly the vocal leader of the team, but Nathan Sell and Jeff Blanchard led on the ice. Blanchard scored some huge goals; the Merrimack empty netter, the late goal in the Lowell game and the game winner against Maine. They will get big goals late in games and that's what you want from your juniors," Mallen said.

"Regardless of the media putting us in ninth at the beginning of the season, we have shown through hard work that we are playing well together. But you can't credit the whole team and hopefully that will carry into the playoffs," Blanchard said. "I don't look at it myself as 'we'll show them'. I think we know at the beginning of the year that we could do it, that there was no question, and we have consistently shown all year that we are a hard–working club. We are going to play as hard as we can and give it 110 percent. I don't look at it as proving it to the media," Blanchard said.

The Minutemen along, with Blanchard, are ready now to head into the playoffs after a one–year absence. Their opponent is Maine. The Minutemen have had success against the Black Bears this season, going 1–1–1 in the three game series, but now UMass will have to do that on the road at Alfond Arena.

"Definitely, that's an advantage for sure. When you split a series like that, a team is going to be thinking, 'which team is going to come in'," Blanchard said.

Lacrosse around the nation: an overview

Vicious competition for the championship looks to mark 1999 season

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

COURTESY SYRACUSE MEDIA RELATIONS

Pre-season All-American Ryan Powell of Syracuse looks to pack scoring punch for the Orangemen.

COURTESY JOHNS HOPKINS MEDIA RELATIONS

Ryan Powell of Syracuse and Brian Carcaterra of Johns Hopkins are two players to keep an eye on during the 1999 collegiate lacrosse season.

Think you've got a lock on who will reign supreme this year in men's college lacrosse? Do you figure you know the secret formula Syracuse will use to win the championship this year? Or are you on Maryland's bandwagon? Johns Hopkins'? Think Princeton will take home trophy No. 4 (in a row)?

Whoever you follow, and whoever you think will stake a claim as top dog in lacrosse this year — one bit of warning: Be prepared to back up your predictions.

With a decade closing and a new season beginning, endless possibilities exist for what could happen over the next few months. The reason is talent, and everybody's got it.

Plus, there are added factors. Johns Hopkins, Syracuse and Towson have new coaches. Princeton has graduated its all– star attack threesome. Casey Powell is no longer a collegiate player. And Duke is knocking on the door of some of the game's venerable powers.

On the heels of their third straight championship season, Princeton claimed Face–Off Magazine's pre–season No. 1 ranking. However, dealing with the loss of three–year starters Jesse Hubbard, Jon Hess and Chris Massey while returning only two proven scorers means coach Bill Tierney will have to develop new strategies. Of course, Tierney does have the luxury of a strong defensive unit.

Johns Hopkins, second in the Face–Off preseason poll, has perhaps the largest pool of talent from which to draw. The Blue Jays return three first–team All–Americans, including Brian Carcaterra, who many consider the nation's best goaltender.

Hopkins is adjusting to a new coach, John Haus, who came to Baltimore after winning last year's Division III title with Washington College.

It's understandable that Haus may feel the pressure to win another title. It's been 12 years since a trophy was brought home to Homewood Field, a long time for a school that has won a title in every decade this century except for the 1990s.

Loyola can probably still feel the sting of last year's 19–8 national semifinal loss to Maryland. That's motivation for a return trip to the final four this season. But the Greyhounds will need strong play out of their defense — where there is only one returning long stick — because their offense, led by Gewas Schindler, will surely put up numbers.

Luckily for Syracuse opponents, Casey Powell has graduated. Unfortunately for 'Cuse opponents, Ryan Powell, Matt Cutia, Chris Cordisco, Devin Darcangelo and a host of other formidable players will be back in orange.

Like Hopkins, the Orangemen are riding a wave of change, adjusting to new coach John Desko. Roy Simmons Jr. retired at the end of last season. Also like Hopkins, Syracuse players have not worn championship rings for a few years.

The Orangemen were also hit with the unexpected loss of three players, including defenseman John Glatzel, when they were arrested for stealing equipment from the field house.

Duke has never won a national title in men's lacrosse. It has only won one Atlantic Coast Conference title. It has a single Final Four appearance.

But the Blue Devils have a deep roster, despite the graduation of John Fay and goalie Craig Seyffer. Now, T.J. Durnan, Jared Frood and Scott Diggs will be counted on even more to carry the offensive load.

Recently, no team has played the "always a bridesmaid, never a bride" role more than Maryland. National runner–up three out of the last four years, the Terrapins boast the best returning ACC goalie in Kevin Healy. They also feature Scott Hochstadt, the conference's leading returning scorer.

Remember these teams when making your arguments. But don't forget about Georgetown, Maryland–Baltimore County, North Carolina, Navy, Hofstra, Hobart, Massachusetts, Butler, and a host of other schools.

Of course, the pre–season only tells so much. It's really the first weekend of major action that sheds more light on the sport. And shed light it did across the nation last weekend.

While 'Cuse and Virginia did battle up north, the best goalie in the nation and the preseason Player of the Year led their team onto the field against the reigning national champs at the Class of 1952 Stadium.

But it was potential Player of the Year A.J. Haugen's shot and Carcaterra's 13 saves — including a point blank stop with two seconds left in the game — that gave Johns Hopkins the 12–11 win.

Syracuse used a three–goal effort from Cordisco to hold off the Cavaliers, 14–12 at the Carrier Dome. Duke rallied from a 10–7 deficit with just over two minutes remaining in its game against Maryland with a four–goal spurt that gave the Devils the win, 11–10. UMBC held off North Carolina, while Harvard fell to host Fairfield.

SGA senators swear up storm

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's meeting ended with name calling and obscenities last night, and with only one more motion on the agenda, frustrated senators decided to adjourn instead of voting.

Senator Brendan Beene from commuter area and senator Jennifer Casavant from Dickinson Residential Hall got into a fight toward the end of the meeting and began calling each other names. It started with a motion to allocate $1500 to the UMass Outing Club from Finance reserve. Senator Beene wanted to debate against this motion and when after failing to be recognized he decided to debate about the next motion, which was to appoint two students to the elections commission.

Senator Beene admitted that he just wanted to debate and that he was mad that he didn't get to debate on the last motion. Senator Casavant called him "an asshole" and he replied by calling her "a fucking bitch."

However other SGA senators went home last night with the feeling of accomplishment. Commuter senator Seth Avakian's motion dealing with affirmative action passed last night after heated debate.

After being amended three times the motion finally read: "Whereas, the university has changed the admissions procedure, and whereas, the university neglected to consult with students on this charge, and whereas the university's new admissions procedure will result in a severe deduction in the member of Asian Latino African and Native American (ALANA) students on the Amherst campus. Be it enacted, that the university return to last year's admissions procedures for one year and be it further enacted that this plan will be implemented for fall 2000 and during this time the university develops plans to attain a goal of 20 percent ALANA enrollment without violating the Boston–Latin decision and the Bakke decision.". The motion passed 19 to 15.

Juan Suarez, a sophomore biology major involved with the protests on campus said, "The senators needed to be more educated but I'm glad it passed. It's sad that our SGA was divided when other SGA's have been backing us for weeks. Many think it's a race issue when it's really an equality issue. Affirmative action sooner or later will be an issue for the whole country."

Senator Avakian was glad to see his motion passed, although unhappy that all the senators didn't vote for it. "I was glad it passed, but I wish it could have unanimous, but considering the political climate of the senate I am glad it passed."

SGA president Salwa Shamapande showed up late to last night's meeting. According to Shamapande nothing has been been settled with his enrollment status and he is not sure when it will be cleared up.

During announcements Senator Jared Brooslin from Coolidge Residential Hall spoke. He is chair of the public policy and relations and today was going to be their first rally held on the student steps. The rally was cancelled when someone made an anonymous call to auxiliary services saying there will be no rally on the students steps.

Brooslin, who was upset that a "sick, deprived person called and cancelled the rally," offered a reward to anyone that could turn in the caller.

According to Brooslin the caller "either didn't want affirmative action discussed or people thought students on my committee were using this as a stepping stone for their campaigns, which was not the case."

In other announcements, there was a reminder about today's rally and that there will be a meeting for programming board, which passed its constitution last night and is ready to start functioning. The programming board meeting will be at 4 p.m. in the SGA office tomorrow.

Teach–in supports Affirmative Action

By Mary Miles
Collegian Staff

A teach–in calling for a continuation of affirmative action in admissions policy at the University of Massachusetts was held in the Campus Center last night.

Some of the key speakers were Afro–American Professor Michael Thelwell and Director of the Asian Latina African and Native American Affairs Office Nelson Acosta.

Thelwell, who has previously worked in the University Admissions Office, went over the different tiers of students who apply to UMass and how admission to the University is determined.

Thelwell said the best students from every high school's graduating class are almost always accepted, but often times ALANA students who rank in the top of their classes are offered more aid at private institutions, and do not come here due to our less generous financial aid. The university does accept, in larger numbers, students who do not do as well in high school.

Thelwell said the majority of students accepted at the university fall into the categories of "very good" and "good," which means that the students have GPA's ranging from 2.75–3.0, with SAT scores of at least 1000. Students from the category of "acceptable" are also sometimes admitted, due to the particular circumstances of the applicant. It is in this category and below that affirmative action has been applied in admitting students into UMass, Thelwell said.

Thelwell also pointed out that students with exceptional academic merit are admitted regardless of race or sex.

Students, community challenge privatization of campus center

By Natty Yogudin
Collegian Staff

Students, community members and auxiliary service employees voiced deep concern and criticism of a possible move towards privatization in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center during an open forum last night.

The forum was the first in a series of three meetings designed to give the public a chance to speak to a private consulting group hired by the university to review operations primarily in the Campus Center. The consulting group will research the topic and suggest different options based on their findings. They will issue their review to university officials on April 12.

One of the concerns discussed was the effect of privatization on student jobs on–campus.

Francis Martin, a supervisor in the Campus Center, cited the condition of student jobs at Salem State College after its services were privatized.

"At Salem State College, they run a referral service because there are no student jobs available," said Martin.

Many students were upset that jobs may be eliminated once the Campus Center is privatized.

"It's not that easy to get a job on–campus if you don't have work–study," said Carly Moskowitz, a sophomore who works at the Bluewall.

"I can't live on 40 dollars a week. Who's going to hire me until I graduate?" said Sarah Smegal, a senior who attended the meeting.

Others argued that privatization will lead to better working conditions on campus. One proposal suggested that students' job security will not be dependent on their grades.

Many questioned the purpose of the study and the origin of its initiation.

"It's fundamental that you know why the study was initiated. My suggestion is [that] a very prime factor, above all, should be the impact upon students," said Alfredo DiLascia, a business owner in Amherst and is also a board member of the local Chamber of Commerce.

"This could be too much financially driven," said DiLascia.

A few major student groups that may be affected are the student businesses.

"If they bring in private contractors, we're going to have a problem, because student businesses cannot compete. Our mission here is to learn, our mission is not to make money," said Gloria Brown, a member of the Board of Student Businesses and a senior at the university.

The consultants will be meeting with various campus representatives, such as student leaders, faculty, and Campus Center workers. They will compile financial, operational, and service reports.

"We're not here to initiate change. We're here to initiate analysis," said John Cornyn, a consultant who spoke at the meeting.

Two more open forums have been scheduled for today with the consulting group. They will occur at 12 and 3 p.m. in the Campus Center.

Student charged with larceny

By Stacey Shackford

Police caught a University of Massachusetts student red– handed as he broke into the Hampden Munchies store at early yesterday morning.

Paul J. McCauley, 22, of 15 Alpine Ave., Everett, was arrested at 4:10 a.m., and charged with breaking and entering nighttime for felony, larceny over $250, larceny under $250, and three counts of malicious destruction of property over $250.

According to UMass Chief of Police John Luippold, the police received a report of glass breaking in Southwest Residential Area, near the Hampden Dining Commons.

Officers noticed a broken window at the Hampden Munchies convenience store when they arrived on the scene, and observed someone walking around inside.

When confronted by the police, the individual attempted to flee by going through the building and out a door adjacent to the convenience store, Luippold said.

McCauley was quickly apprehended by police as he tried to make his escape and was arrested. He is being charged with three counts of malicious destruction of property for breaking at least two windows.

He is also charged with two counts of larceny because, according to Luippold, he was allegedly in the process of stealing a variety of items from the convenience store, including video tapes, assorted cameras, pens, batteries and other merchandise.

Luippold commends "both the public response in notifying police of the breaking glass, as well as the quick response of the officers which enabled the individual to be caught during the commission of this crime."

McCauley was arraigned in Hampshire County District Court in Northampton yesterday. His case will be continued until April 8, when he will have a pre–trial hearing.

UMass police to investigate assaults, rape

The University of Massachusetts police are investigating two cases of assault and battery that occurred this week in the Southwest Residential Area.

According to UMass Chief of Police John Luippold, the police received a report Sunday afternoon from University Health Services about a possible rape that occurred this weekend.

Police are working with the victim to develop a statement and complete the necessary paperwork, Luippold said yesterday. He was unable to release any further information about the incident due to the preliminary nature of the investigation.

Luippold also said yesterday that a verbal agreement in Coolidge Residence Hall led to an assault between two former roommates Monday afternoon.

One individual received lacerations to the head that required stitches, Luippold said. He was treated and released at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton. The other individual refused medical treatment.

A request for a show cause hearing for charges of assault and battery is being filed.

Faculty union declares opposition to changes to Affirmative Action

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts faculty union has drafted a letter urging University President William Bulger, Chancellor David K. Scott and the UMass Board of Trustees to repeal all changes made to the university's affirmative action policies.

"The Executive Board of the Massachusetts Society of Professors strongly supports the principle of Affirmative Action and calls on the administration to make every effort to recruit a diverse student body that reflects the high school graduates of Massachusetts," stated the Executive Board in an open letter to faculty.

"We call for a return to the old admissions policy while a careful and thoughtful study of the subject is undertaken by a commission genuinely representative of the diversity of the students, faculty and staff of the campus. We call upon the President, the Board of Trustees and the Chancellor to announce the suspension of the new policy, and the establishment of the new commission forthwith."

This announcement was the latest in a series of statements made by faculty condemning the University's changes in affirmative action procedures.

In an earlier letter to Chancellor Scott, Marta B. Calas, the Acting Director of the Women's Studies Program, requested on behalf of the Women's Studies Executive Committee that "you exert your leadership position as an innovative thinker on university policies nationwide, and send a strong message to the country regarding the crucial significance of admission policies for universities."

"This message," she continued, "is that the highest standard of education can only be achieved through a commitment to social justice and opportunity for all."

On February 18, the university announced that it would not make race a priority in its admissions policies. This decision came in the wake of the Massachusetts Federal Court ruling against public high school Boston Latin.

In addition, the Center for Equal Opportunity, a Washington DC — based conservative organization, requested admissions statistics for a nationwide investigation on affirmative action from UMass in July.

The university's decision brought a hailstorm of criticism from student groups. On March 3, a rally was held to protest the admissions changes.

The Amherst College Student Government Organization (SGO) voted last week to declare its support for protesting student groups.

"The decision to remove race as a factor in admissions decisions will have devastating effects upon the University," the SGO stated.

"The enrollment of minority and low–income students at UMass has been on the decline already, and Chancellor Scott has conceded that this decision will cause minority enrollment to drop by as much as a third in next year's first year class," they said.

Chancellor Scott insists that university has not completely eliminated race as a factor, and that the university has not abandoned its commitment to minority students.

"In 1994 the campus set a goal of recruiting a freshman class which reflects the diversity of the graduating seniors from the high schools of Massachusetts," he stated in a letter entitled "Towards a Commonwealth of Learning."

"We remain committed to this goal as a responsible educational and social policy for the economic future of the Commonwealth, even as we develop new strategies for reaching our goal in the context of emerging legal optnion."

UMass, Amherst College police investigate link between thefts

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police are teaming up with the Amherst College Police Department to investigate the connection between a series of gymnasium locker room thefts and a stolen motor vehicle.

Amherst Police recovered a motor vehicle Sunday that had been stolen from UMass Saturday afternoon. According to UMass Chief of Police John Luippold, the car theft is directly related to a larceny that had occurred earlier that day in Boyden Gymnasium, in which the keys to the stolen vehicle were taken from a locker.

Amherst College police came across the vehicle early Sunday morning; an officer, noticing the car did not have an Amherst College parking sticker, ran a registration check and discovered it had been stolen from UMass the day before.

The vehicle was found in a lot near Amherst College's Alumni Gymnasium, the site of a recent series of locker break-ins similar to those that occurred this past week at UMass' Boyden Gymnasium.

This has led police to believe the locker-room thefts are connected, and that the same individual or individuals, has been breaking into lockers and removing personal items from both gymnasiums. So far, only men's locker rooms have been targeted.

Several thefts occurred last week, and again this weekend, at Boyden Gymnasium. Luippold said the individual was going through the locker room searching for unsecured lockers. The suspect may also have been using bolt cutters to remove locks.

Police, concerned about the frequency of the thefts, issued a public safety alert Tuesday to warn the campus community about the incidents.

There are no suspects at this time, and police are cautioning students and staff to be on alert for suspicious individuals, and remind everyone to "always secure lockers, desks and offices when they are not in use."

Anyone with information should contact the UMass Police Department at 545-2121.

and that affirmative action doesn't "keep good students out" of UMass.

Thelwell also referred to the Boston Latin school federal court case, in which a Caucasian lawyer's daughter was denied acceptance at the prestigious Boston high school because her spot was taken by a black student with credentials which were not quite as good as hers. In this case, the lawyer's daughter won, stirring up a lot of controversy about affirmative action and causing the high school to change its affirmative action policy.

The teach-in referred to statistics taken by the Princeton Review which showed that students whose parents fall into a higher income bracket tend to do better on their SATs. A view which Chancellor David K. Scott has often mentioned when discussing admissions policy.

Acosta questioned how a student from Springfield could be able to do as well as a student from Amherst. Acosta pointed out that students whose parents make less money are not only enrolled in poorer high schools, but also do not have access to a SAT review programs such as Kaplan, which can cost parents hundreds of dollars.

Acosta also brought up UMass President William Bulger's plan for the new Honors Commonwealth College, which will begin giving the top students from high schools all across the state full scholarships. These scholarships will be given to students regardless of their race or financial status. This means that if a student comes from a wealthy family he or she will be taking valuable scholarship money away from a poorer student who may be in greater need.

Acosta feels the Commonwealth College will also segregate the honors students from "average" students, as they will be living in separate dorms with the newest and best facilities on campus.

Acosta questioned why Bulger would do this, as he usually associates with working class districts of Boston.

Many audience members puked in and out of the teach-in as they checked on proceedings of a Student Government Association meeting.

The teach-in comes in conjunction with numerous other events in the Five-College area held this week discussing affirmative action issues. A rally at noon today will be held on the Student Union steps. The speakers and members of the audience said that this is one of the first of many steps to be taken in ensuring affirmative action continues to be used when evaluating students for admission here at UMass.

Hometown nymphos

Naked people can be very scary. I didn't realize how scary they could actually be until last Saturday night. I mean, I know that war, the first time I saw Scream, and bus stations are also scary, but gross naked people are scarier than all of these put together. Before Saturday, the idea of seeing one of my relatives naked scared me and the naked old lady in There's Something About Mary scared the hell out of me as well. The potential horror that some naked people possess didn't really come to my attention until Saturday, when my friend "Double A" brought to my attention a magazine which he found in third floor bathroom of JQA. It wasn't Playboy, it wasn't Penthouse, it wasn't even Hustler; it was called Letters From Hometown Nymphs.

Dan Viens

This title is just plain wrong. I don't know what the worst part is, but I do know that number one, this magazine should never have been printed, and number two, if it had to be printed, no one should ever have thought of the title Letters From Hometown Nymphs. Let's just start with the first word: "Letters." It's bad enough that on the pages of this magazine there are pictures of gross naked men and women who could be from any of our little hometowns, but they also have to include graphic descriptions of their extraordinarily sick sexual encounters. I just don't understand who wants to read about their hometown librarian and the time she got it from two guys in the science fiction section while she was screaming random Dewey Decimal numbers.

I think that the word "Hometown" is the one that really troubles me the most. You see, I live in a small suburb/hick town. A lot of the women in my town wear flannel shirts and chew tobacco. The idea of them posing naked for pictures in their barn and then sending them to a magazine, like the one in question, makes me ill. When I think about it, I want to move to another town — but who is to say that I will be safe from the secret porn queen nymphs anywhere else.

Please, for a moment, just imagine that quite possibly any woman in your hometown could be living some secret perverted life. How would you react when the manager at Dunkin' Donuts handed you your bagel with veggie cream cheese if you knew the kind of pictures she and her boyfriend had of her and various vegetables. Would you really feel comfortable cashing your check at the local bank if you knew that the teller's tax return said "Bank Teller and Hometown Nympho"? I don't think that I would be comfortable at all. Just imagine your high school principal, your lunch ladies, your bus driver, your best friend's mom and the women on the city council all taking pictures of their hideous sexual perversions. I don't think that I will ever be able to go to the supermarket and look at everyone the same knowing that a magazine like Letters From Hometown Nymphs exists.

If the title was Letters From Hollywood Nymphs, then I might think that it was kind of a weird magazine to own, but I would definitely not be experiencing this same emotional trauma. After all, Hollywood is very far away and everyone kind of expects strange stuff to come from there. I would even be happy if the magazine was called Letters From Cincinnati Nymphs. Anything but "Hometown" would make me happy.

The last word, "Nymphs", is sort of upsetting. I mean up to this point the title seems like something that everyone can be proud of. If someone had a letter in Letters From Hometown Gardeners, then everyone would be proud. The person would probably be on the cover of his hometown newspaper. If they replaced nymphs with astronomers, chefs, lawyers or doctors, then everyone would be honored to have a member of his or her town printed in such a publication. However, not too many people have a lot of pride in any famous nymphs they know. I would even go so far as to say that if everyone knew that one of their town's citizens had a letter printed in Letters From Hometown Nymphs they might be ashamed or disgusted.

I am afraid that my life has been seriously affected by Double A's discovery of Hometown Nymphs. Now I can't help but think that in any house in any town around me, some ugly weird couple is taking pictures of some horrific sex act that will someday appear on the shelves of the local sex shop and then end upon the floor of a bathroom that I will have the grave misfortune of using. Upon seeing a hometown Nympho I actually know, I would probably end up stabbing my eyes until I go blind, pasting-out or dying. And man, all of those results really suck.

Social Security in trouble

So let's talk issues, and no it has nothing to do with the issue affirmative action or anything else related specifically to this campus, but it does involve all of you.

You may not know it yet, but Social Security is in trouble. It's in big trouble. Over the next 30 years, the baby boomers will be retiring and they will leave a huge burden on you, the random student who is about to enter the job market.

Many of you might say it's time that we end Social Security altogether, and that its service is now obsolete. But if you have family that is using Social Security to make ends meet every month, you might think otherwise.

The bottom line: many people are saying let's privatize Social Security or move the Social Security Trust Fund into the stock market, or just moving everyone into a 401k plan.

While these are all feasible ideas, the biggest problem is that all these ideas are relatively new. What about the people who have spent their entire lives working for that pension and didn't have a 401K option? Do we just leave them out in the cold? No! We can't do that because that's not what the United States is about.

So what can we do? President Bill Clinton has proposed that we throw 62% of the budget surplus from the last fiscal year into the Social Security Trust Fund and into Medicare, which would help again aging Americans, and use the other 38% for possible tax cuts and other random programs.

But the GOP is pushing for more tax cuts that really will not help the average American. The theory that the Republicans are using says that if you return more money to the taxpayers it will boost the economy and create future budget surpluses. The Republicans say that you can't go by projected budget surpluses that President Clinton says will exist. But there is extra money this year without any major tax cuts in the past. Why shouldn't that continue, considering we don't have to use all that extra money on welfare?

The bottom line is that welfare, if done right and given to people in need, is very useful. If not, there is no need for it. The other factor is that the people who were abusing welfare are no longer using up that money, and that in itself should create surpluses from now on.

In 1983, Senate Majority leader Bob Dole was appointed by President Ronald Reagan to save Social Security until 2030. Despite failing miserably, he was able to hold off the impending problem by heavily taxing wealthier Social Security recipients. Even though he is a Republican, Dole has said that tax cuts, like Steve Forbes' proposed across–the–board tax cuts, would just hurt the situation.

Paul Teves

Where does this leave us in terms of Social Security? We should be putting money into the trust fund and letting it grow. I don't necessarily agree with Clinton's proposal of putting the money into the stock market, because it will create a huge conflict of interest.

What should be done? Take the money and let it collect interest, or just save it so that in 2030, when the heart of the baby boomers begin to retire, there will be money to handle the huge burden on us and the government.

Don't forget that this will leave those of us in the working class of the future in better shape. We will not have to worry about pouring 25 percent of our pay into Social Security and Medicare. Remember, it's either pay less taxes now, or go broke in 30 years when the cost of living is higher and the wages are still low, according to the GOP.

It is a simple Darwinian theory, survival of the fittest. I don't want to screw anyone over, but if we as a nation can weather the storm, we can dodge several bullets for our future and create a better society.

You, who will be joining the work-force in the next four years, should be letting your Representative or Senator know how you feel. And you should let Social Security, and what your Congressmen has done, be some of the guiding issues in the 2000 election.

A woman's place...

Browsing through a thrift shop, I chanced upon a yellowed paperback copy of Diary of a Mad Housewife, by Sue Kaufman. Intrigued by the cover photograph of a haunted-looking '60s woman, I bought and read it. At first, it seemed like just another pulp confessional. But certain attitudes in the novel disturbed me in their naivety.

In the novel, Kat, mother of two, is married to an upwardly mobile man. They join in all the urban nouveau riche pastimes: going to shows and exclusive parties and redecorating the house. Kat's husband expects her to constantly improve their home, keeping up with the rest of their friends. He is embarrassed by the classic novels she reads, and wants her to focus on current, "conversational" reading. He recommends outfits for her that look "smart."

Kat is conscious that her life lacks something — a graduate of Smith College, she sometimes feels demeaned in her submissive, stifling role as housewife. Her daughters and ambitious husband do not make her as happy as she "should be."

In an attempt to ward off her depression, Kat takes a lover. I kept expecting the "usual" ending — the wife realizes that she needs more than her husband, the social climber, so she starts a new, fulfilling life with her lover and becomes a writer. Not quite. In the end, Kat learns that her family's finances are substantially reduced because of her husband's spending. She decides to leave her lover and become an efficient, bustling housewife, visualizing herself as a sort of Mary Poppins, with a "crisp apron." Through this, she believes her "nameless problem" will be solved!

I was baffled. Then I looked at the publishing date: 1963. Exactly the year The Feminine Mystique was first printed in its entirety. Imagine reading about a woman on the verge of, and extremely ready for a cultural breakthrough, but completely unaware that her problem has a name.

The Feminine Mystique exposed the way women were taught to seek happiness only by confining themselves to their "feminine" role as wives and mothers, especially following World War II. it diagnosed the "desperate and empty" feeling many women shared, linking it to the distorted image of femininity in our culture that arrested women's intellectual growth, hampered their sexual fulfillment, and was a major barrier to realizing their potential.

Tanya Mannes

Diary reminded me of when I was barely 14 years old. One day, two elders from my congregation took me into a quiet room and asked me questions, using them as an opportunity to gauge my faith. I answered the scriptural questions correctly, and thought that they would approve me for baptism. After baptism I would be "Sister Mannes," like my mother. To my surprise, the elders told me a few weeks later that I was not ready for baptism, because in their words I "lacked a submissive attitude."

It was difficult to accept such a blunt, though apt, appraisal of my character. I believed in the basic theology of Jehovah's Witnesses, never questioning that the "Great Tribulation" would come soon and wipe out the "wicked ones." More to the point, I believed in the everyday aspects of the religion, those relating to women and men.

For one thing, I was used to the idea that just as Christ is head of the congregation, the man is head of the woman. As in many religions, women could not speak in front of the congregation as a speaker would. But the attitude of submission was something that conflicted with ideas that I was learning elsewhere. Specifically, I had been reading one of the most influential books of my life, The Feminine Mystique, which I had borrowed from the library.

I think it is wonderful that women can take for granted the influence Betty Friedan's book had. It shows how fast our society can change. In the mere 36 years since The Feminine Mystique was published, women have taken power in many areas that were previously discouraged. As for me, the ideas in a seemingly out-of-date text changed the way I thought about my own potential. Knowledge made me question my assigned role; it made me "not submissive enough."

Letters to the Editor

"Excellence" Bulger–style

To the editor:

The University's recent public statements on affirmative action attempt to foster support for the view that the decision to modify affirmative action strategies was an unavoidable consequence of "the changing legal environment." UMass exploits the purported ominous legal climate, as the centerpiece of their public relations campaign. A clever ploy, if not for the recent University decisions regarding low–income students and student parents, which suggest a more ominous explanation.

The context in which the decision was made reflects political agendas that are wed to the enhancement of university prestige through the narrowly defined pursuit of "excellence." The excellence of groups such as low–income student parents, and those of certain race or ethnic background, does not conform to "excellence" as defined by the university's leaders. Consequently, these groups are not considered worthy of defense, and therefore may be well on their way to elimination from this public institution.

Unequivocally, the "excellence" lauded and pursued by these leaders enhances administrators' reputations, improves institutional rankings, and entices generous corporate donations — "excellence" as defined by high SATs, high GPAs, high class rank and the coveted production of Rhodes and Marshall Scholars. Clearly, President Bulger has set the standard. Robert Karam, Chair of the University Board of Trustees, justified Bulger's hefty raise based on the fact that under Bulger's helm applications, enrollments, SATs and GPAs were up; $15 million was secured from state funds to launch the new and improved Honors College; and Bulger's "pet project," the University Scholars program, attracted 145 valedictorians.

The Chancellor can talk ad nauseam about broadening the definition of diversity, increasing the yield of minority student applicants and his dream of launching an educational Marshall Plan. Yet the defining rules of the game are still written in Boston. The name of the game remains "Excellence, Bulger–Style." SATs and GPAs are not the only scores on the rise; the casualties of excellence have reached an all–time high.

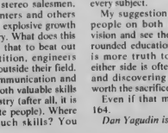
Liberal engineering



The Engineering advisor looked down at my schedule. From his disgruntled look, I understood he was not happy, but nothing could have prepared me for the words that followed: "You remind me of a liberal arts student," he said.

Why did I deserve such an insult, you ask? That question was soon answered, as the advisor pointed to the object of his discontent: the line reading "PHIL 164 Medical Ethics." Because the class did not fulfill any of the engineering criteria, the advisor explained politely, I was crazy to sign up for it. Even worse — I was acting like a liberal arts student.

One of the things that has always irritated me is the extent to which many colleges, including UMass, polarize their education. Engineers are not required to take foreign languages. English majors require very few math courses to graduate. The thinking behind this scheme is that students come to college to get the tools for their future profession and very little else. Any extra knowledge is frowned upon as an unnecessary burden. This approach also leads to stereotypes — engineers are the ones who will make loads of cash spending their lives behind a computer screen, while liberal arts majors are seen as the ones who will roam around penniless while happily contemplating life. At least from the engineering end, these requirements are in line with industry demand.

Computer companies want people with strong math and science backgrounds, and could not care less about everything else. The demands of the industry and the subsequent actions of the administration are ignoring one important point, however. This point is that to a large extent (larger, i'm sure, than many of us would be willing to admit) education makes you who you are.

What you do in UMass will go far beyond learning what you need for your future job. For many of us, this will be one of our last, best chances to change who we are before we enter the mysterious void known as "the rest of our lives." When seen in this light, the logic behind the polarization of education begins to unravel.

Dan Yagudin

First, as one who has experienced the computer industry first–hand for the past 2.5 years, I can attest to the practicality of the liberal arts. My boss, a well respected man in the corporation for which I worked, is not an engineer, but a psychology major. He often credits his insight into people with bringing him this far.

Second, (cover your virgin eyes, all you comp–sci majors out there) anyone can write code. In fact, the demand is so high that most of the coders in the company I worked for had no engineering, or computer science, or even math backgrounds. They were former stereo salesmen, housewives, carpenters and others who jumped on the explosive growth curve of the industry. What does this mean? This means that to beat out increasing competition, engineers must look to skills outside their field. Among others, communication and political skills are both valuable skills to have in the industry (after all, it is people who promote people). Where would you find such skills? You won't find them in calculus or circuit design classes. You would — you guessed it — find it in the liberal arts.

Finally, much is lost when engineers and liberal arts majors look at each others' fields with spite. Engineers can learn a lot from the open-mindedness and expressiveness of liberal arts majors. On the other hand, engineers possess the disciplinary skills that liberal arts majors often don't. Furthermore, in a world increasingly dominated by technology, technical skills are a sought-after commodity in just about every subject.

My suggestion, therefore, is for people on both sides to have the vision and see the good that a truly rounded education would do. There is more truth to this world than either side is often willing to admit, and discovering this truth is well worth the sacrifice.

Even if that means taking PHIL 164.

March Madness, Oscars hit the small screen this month

The annual time for college basketball to shine has arrived. The words "March" and "Madness" seem to go together as well as "Peanut Butter" and "Jelly," or more accurately, "Dick Vitale" and "Shut the hell up!" The people of the world will be sitting on the edge of their seats watching the nail-biting excitement that can only be brought forth by a game such as Wisconsin versus Southwest Missouri State.

Okay, so maybe there's a little sarcasm in my whole outlook on college hoops, but I think there needs to be a certain amount of humor when talking about something that is revered so much in our society.

Other than the Super Bowl, the day that the Final Four is played, (this year it's Saturday, March 27th) brings in the most television viewers all year.

The big advertisers will be the same as always. You can almost bet (not that anyone would do any betting around the time of the NCAA tournament) that there will be countless ads from companies such as Budweiser, Coke, Pepsi and many different automobile companies. With the price of an average commercial during the two games that will be played on the big day being about 1.5 million dollars for an average 30 second spot, advertisers are all set to shell out huge sums of money to peddle their products.

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

However, the biggest problem for advertisers during the month of March is deciding on how much money to spend during the time of the tournament that is not the day the Final Four is played. It is obvious that people will be watching, but will they be watching enough to make an expensive series of ads, run over three weeks, pay off? In my opinion, it will be extremely difficult. With the price of commercials on the rise — and the obvious ideology that if the price of the commercial rises, then the price of the product will as well — things may be looking down for big companies.

Whether or not the American public will be willing to pay extra for products simply because they have to foot the bill for an advertisement during a sporting event, is questionable. If the advertisers do not get the results they are looking for, that could mean the beginning of a big-time change in big- time advertisements.

The Final Four is not the only event in the month of March during which companies will have to shell out a lot of money to show the world their stuff. On Sunday, March 21st, the 71st Annual Academy Awards Show, another spectacular event with an enormous viewing audience, goes on the air. You would think that the two events would bring in an entirely different audience, but when polls are done, the results show that no matter how you look at it, both events draw a huge audience. People will be watching them no matter what, and it will be interesting to see which companies choose to advertise at the Oscars and which advertise on Final Four Saturday. It will be even more interesting to see which companies advertise at both.

As far as the NCAA tournament's television time in the next few weeks, the schedule goes like this: For the first few days, beginning today, there will be games on at all hours of the day. The first round of the sixty-four team tournament is completely finished by tomorrow night. The games will still run constantly throughout the weekend as the teams who advance from the first round will quickly enter the second. The rest of the rounds are played–out up until March 27th, when the final four teams will play the semi-final games to determine the two teams who will play for the national championship.

What has always been ironic to me is that the day that everyone is watching there is no national champion determined. The finals of the tournament are actually played on Monday, March 29th. The idea behind this is sheer genius. If the finals were played on the Saturday that is customarily the most watched day of the tournament, there will only be one game. In this case there are two games, thus leading to a longer viewing time by the audience. Even though the tournament is geared around the Final Four, the national championship game brings in a huge audience, as well.

The amount of viewers is not quite as high as the number on Saturday, but if I was CBS (the network broadcasting most of the tournament) I wouldn't be complaining. Pretty much all of the ratings will go to CBS, and they will actually have something besides "60 Minutes" that will have people hooked. I mean, let's face it, CBS gets excellent ratings during NFL season, but other than that, pretty much all of their programming is pure trash (not that I don't find "Payne" hysterically funny... Oh wait, that one sucks too). They must be thanking the basketball gods that sports have returned.

In retaliation to the big NCAA tournament, most networks are unfortunately running repeats. Don't even bother trying to tune into NBC on Thursday nights for at least the next two weeks, because "ER" and "Frasier" are repeats. "Friends" runs a repeat tonight, but will be back next week with an all–new episode. As for the rest of the week, you can expect to see old episodes of "Dawson's Creek," "Ally McBeal," "Felicity," "Home Improvement," and "Spin City" along with many other series that simply do not want to compete with the NCAA tournament. Even "The Simpsons" does not want to be daring enough to show a new episode on March 21st to challenge the Academy Awards.

It's just too risky for advertisers to send their support somewhere else, because the price of a commercial is way too high. Not everyone is looking forward to the national hysteria known as March Madness, and these are the people that simply lose out when it comes time to turn on the tube.

Even though I'm extremely critical of pretty much everything about the NCAA on television, I'm a huge basketball fan. The bottom line is that I'm happy that I can pretty much watch more basketball games than the Harlem Globetrotters play in a year. I'll hear the familiar screams of "Will you get off the couch!" from my parents, and with one hand I'll be holding a bag of chips and some soda, and the other will be resting against my lazy, pounding chest.

Jazz ensemble rocks the rhythm Tues. at Bowker

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

In celebration of the 18th Annual Jazz Showcase, the University of Massachusetts, Amherst Department of Music & Dance presented a rousing tribute to Duke Ellington and gospel legend Thomas A. Dorsey, Tuesday night in Bowker Auditorium.

The showcase, under the direction of Professor Jeffrey Holmes, included performances by Jazz Ensemble I, African–American Music & Vocal Jazz Ensemble, Chapel Jazz Ensemble, Jazz Lab Ensemble and the AAJ Jazz Collective Orchestra (composed of majors and faculty in the jazz studies program).

As the lights dimmed, a film of Duke Ellington playing in an orchestra appeared at the back of the stage. Immediately following the clip, the Jazz Ensemble I performed a rocking set, aptly titled "Rockin' in Rhythm."

Also intermingled throughout the evening were film clips of Thomas A. Dorsey and musical interludes which filled the gaps between each section of the show. This multimedia aspect of the event was very effective and entertaining.

One of the most interesting film clips was of Dorsey explaining that the death of his wife was the impetus for his composition of "Precious Lord, Take My Hand."

Following the film clip, Professor Horace Clarence Boyer performed, with both piano and voice, a soulful rendition of Dorsey's piece "Precious Lord, Take My Hand."

The African–American Music & Vocal Jazz Ensemble, under the direction of Boyer, presented two of Dorsey's spirituals, including "On the Battle Field" and "Old Ship of Zion." The different vocal components blended nicely and the interpretations of these pieces were inspiring.

The Chapel Jazz Ensemble, under the direction of David Sporny, performed an entrancing version of Ellington's "Warm Valley."

Following the intermission, the Jazz Lab Ensemble shook things up a bit with Ellington's "Concerto for Cootie" and "Cottontail."

Eugene Uman toned things down by playing the piano section of "The Single Petal of a Rose," a piece that the "Duke" of Jazz wrote after meeting the Queen of England.

Special guest drummer, Steve Houghton, with the aid of the AAJ Jazz Collective Orchestra, proceeded to bring the house down with a number of pieces, several of which were not on the program. These highly intense sets, including some by Chick Correia and Thelonius Monk, got the audience's toes tapping and hands clapping.

Off–road skates are the new way

By Popular Mechanics
Associated Press

The latest inline wrinkle is called off-road or mountain skating, and the new hardware has evolved in much the same way as that for mountain bikes, Cliff Gromer writes in the March issue of Popular Mechanics.

Originally developed as a training device for hockey players and alpine skiers, off-road skates were a narrow product used in summer training by serious winter athletes. No more.

Taking a cue from mountain biking, skate manufacturers Rollerblade and Roces figured skaters shouldn't have to stop where the pavement ends.

Designing the skates took some doing. Bigger wheels were required for more flotation and to prevent the dreaded digging-in and resulting splat. But they had to fit under the skate and not raise the center of gravity too much.

Frames had to be beefed up, too, with alloy replacing the plastic common in street skates. Boots had to be tougher and designed with different parameters of flex, and there had to be a system to handle off-road bumps and grinds.

8MM star Joaquin Phoenix sports his funky hair–do.

Film Clips

8MM (dir Joel Schumacher, with Nicholas Cage, Joaquin Phoenix, Playing at Mountain Farms) There's only one word to describe 8mm: dark. Really dark. It also has a simple, methodical plot, a solid performance from Nicholas Cage, and an even better performance from Joaquin Phoenix. As atmospheric as Seven, but not quite as compelling. B– (Adam Martignetti)

BLAST FROM THE PAST (dir Hugh Wilson, with Brendan Fraser, Alicia Silverstone, Playing at Mountain Farms). A man born and raised in an isolated fallout shelter by parents stuck in the 50's ventures out into crazy, 90's California to find a wife. It's at once a ridiculous and interesting idea for a movie. But the film, despite the affecting performance of Brendan Fraser, is not brave enough to use its available strangeness to support much more than an ordinary boy–meets–girl–with–complications romantic comedy. C– (Rob Roensch)

MESSAGE IN A BOTTLE (dir Luis Mandoki, with Kevin Costner, Robin Wright Penn, Playing at Mountain Farms) Mark Message in a Bottle "Return to sender." The Kevin Costner film has a chance to be a poetic and creative romance, but instead resorts to hum–drum formulas and tired melodrama. Inept acting and hopelessly–slow direction mar it further. Beautiful photography and the presence of Paul Newman are the only highlights. D (Adam Martignetti)

PAYBACK (dir Brian Helgeland, with Mel Gibson, Maria Bello, Playing at Mountain Farms). Payback is a movie about violence — about guns and fights and people killing each other. But the violence is only part of the bleak world this film creates, mixing lifeless photography and a tired but strong performance by Mel Gibson. Payback sets its goals low, but hits most of them. B (R.R.)

SHAKESPEARE IN LOVE (dir John Madden, with Joseph Fiennes, Gwyneth Paltrow, Playing at Academy of Music). Art and life have had a chaotic history, alternatively frustrating and inspiring each other. In Shakespeare in Love, the Bard (Joseph Fiennes) is suffering writer's block at the dawn of the first performance of the yet–unwritten Romeo and Juliet, until he finds his muse in Paltrow. Wit, enchantment, high comedy and passion follows. A marvelous supporting cast, led by Judi Dench and Geoffrey Rush, and an impeccable script, co–written by noted playwright Tom Stoppard. A (B.M.)

WAKING NED DIVINE (dir Kirk Jones, with Ian Bannen, David Kelly, Playing at Pleasant St.) Writer/director Jones provides wonderfully bizarre characters in this little film about an unknown lottery winner in a small Irish town. A marvelous ensemble cast, particularly Ian Bannen and Michael O'Sullivan, lead this alluring and enchanting film about the little quirks of life, the twists of fate, and the ties of friendship. B (A.M.)

win this year? Will size prevail again in the race for best picture? Well, sit back and relax, that's what I'm here to tell you.

ACTRESS IN A SUPPORTING ROLE: In my opinion, this category is about as weak as it has ever been. Kathy Bates? There must have been some overlooked performances out there. Lisa Kudrow and Christina Ricci come to mind.

Who Should Win: Judi Dench. In one of the shortest (time wise) roles ever nominated, Dench manages to be charming, funny, and powerful.

Who Will Win: Judi Dench. She's a presence as Queen Elizabeth and Shakespeare in Love's popularity will help her.

ACTOR IN A SUPPORTING ROLE: Unlike its female counterpart, the competition here is strong with three or maybe four possible winners. Only Robert Duvall falls victim to Meryl Streep disease — he's there because of his name.

Who Should Win: Billy Bob Thornton. Returning to another slow-witted role, like the one which won him critical acclaim in Sling Blade, Billy Bob proves why he's a great actor in the brilliantly textured A Simple Plan. Thornton is thoroughly engaging, giving off the impression that he always knows more than he lets on. By the end of the movie, he breaks your heart.

Who Will Win: Geoffrey Rush. For some inane reason, the Truman Show and Ed Harris, who took home a Golden Globe in this category, have been falling off the Academy's radar quickly. Look for Rush to take advantage. Ironically, most people would argue that Rush's role in Elizabeth, the "other" Elizabethan movie, was his true Oscar-worthy effort. So, the Academy must have enjoyed his small, but delightful role in Shakespeare to choose it. Personally, I think this is one case where the movie will help the actor tremendously.

BEST ACTRESS: Much like the Best Picture contest, this is a two horse race. I can guarantee one thing: the winner will come from a movie about Elizabethan times.

Who Should Win: Cate Blanchett and Gwyneth Paltrow. If ever there were a reason to split an Oscar, this is it. Two tall, slender, graceful blondes, who gave amazing, career-defining performances in two of the best movies of the year.

Who Will Win: In a photo finish, I give the edge to Cate Blanchett. With her sumptuous, powerful and dramatic turn as Queen Elizabeth. Blanchett almost single-handedly carried Elizabeth to a best picture nomination. She deserves to win just for that.

BEST ACTOR: Most people are going to look at this category and go "huh?" I know I did. Unfortunately, some of these great performances were never seen due to extremely limited screens for most of the movies.

Who Should Win: Jim Carrey. OK, I know the idiots at the Academy didn't have the guts to nominate him, but I think even Tom Hanks would be laughing at the "talking out your butt routine." Jokes aside, he was incredibly genuine as Truman Burbank and genuinely robbed.

Who Will Win: Tom Hanks. The Oscar darling will dominate the lesser-known field and claim his third victory this decade. Hanks only gave his usual spectacular, well thought-out performance in the biggest, most powerful movie of 1998.

BEST ADAPTED SCREENPLAY: Unlike last year, there's no consolation prize waiting like there was for L.A. Confidential.

Who Should Win: A Simple Plan. Easily the most under- rated movie of last year, the writing combined a masterful setting with brilliant contrasts and rich irony for one of the smoothest, most well-crafted movies that I've ever seen.

Who Will Win: Out of Sight. The adaptation of Elmore Leonard's novel was clever, romantic, poignant and strangely redeeming. The movie has gotten too much critical praise to go unnoticed by the Academy.

BEST ORIGINAL SCREENPLAY: Talk about a loaded category. Take the two favorites for Best Picture, throw in a political satire, Bulworth, a brilliant foreign film, Life is Beautiful, and The Truman Show and you've got a big traffic jam.

Who Should Win: Shakespeare in Love. Regardless of whether this movie does or does not win its rightful Best Picture award, no one can argue that any movie had a script funnier, more charming, romantic, or clever than this one.

Who Will Win: Shakespeare in Love. If it does win Best Picture, this will be further proof of its greatness. If it does not, then this is a parting gift, as a token of gratitude. In other words, another consolation prize for Miramax.

BEST DIRECTOR: See "Best Original Screenplay" for an appropriate summary here. Incidentally, I think this might be Shakespeare in Love's weakest category.

Who Should Win: Peter Weir. It's hard to imagine that the man who filmed one of the most creative, entertaining and prophetic films of the year, and then cast a goofy comic, Jim Carrey, in the serious lead role would not win this award, but Weir is a definite long shot. The end of The Truman Show was one of the most inspiring, heart-warming moments that I have ever seen.

Who Will Win: Steven Spielberg. Spielberg did not re- define the World War II movie, he just showed everyone how they should have been doing it all along. I don't think I have ever been in a theater so awe-struck and somber during a movie as when I saw Saving Private Ryan. Spielberg deserves to win for bringing us to the battle lines, letting us see the suffering and reminding us that there is hope, but not without loss.

BEST PICTURE: One of two movies will take home Hollywood's most distinguished award this year. Shakespeare in Love or Saving Private Ryan. Elizabeth was great, but is forever destined to be the other movie with the Virgin Queen in it. The Thin Red Line was easily the most overrated movie of the year. Someday, I too will make an obtuse WWII movie and get 7 Oscar nominations. The Truman Show, Pleasantville, A Simple Plan, or Waking Ned Devine all would have been better choices here. Frankly, If Life is Beautiful wins, it will be the biggest upset ever. Not taking anything away from Roberto Benigni's charming film, but Life is Beautiful will go home with its deserved Best Foreign Language Film Oscar and that's all.

Who Should Win: Shakespeare in Love. In case you haven't noticed, I like this film a lot. Quite simply, it was funny, romantic, intelligent, witty, moving and beautiful. It made me fall in love with Shakespeare all over again.

Who Will Win: Saving Private Ryan. Yes, size prevails again. Hollywood loves telling itself how great it is; see Titanic, last year. Hollywood also loves WWII movies; see the nomination for The Thin Red Line this year. Lastly, Hollywood shies away from comedy; see the snubbing of Jim Carrey and The Truman Show. Fortunately, Saving Private Ryan was a great movie and a worthy recipient of the award. It just wasn't the best in my opinion.

In other Oscar news, it will be interesting to see whether the Academy will try to put together a last minute tribute to legendary director Stanley Kubrick, who passed away last Sunday. Kubrick had been repeatedly shunned by the Academy — he won only for visual effects for 2001: A Space Odyssey — but the Academy is notorious for solving all their past errors with one big tribute, so expect one that Sunday night.

Incidentally, with Kubrick's death, perhaps the last great living director is Steven Spielberg, who will undoubtedly take the podium Sunday night at least once. Expect Spielberg, the biggest movie lan out of anyone, to make his own heartfelt mention of Kubrick's influence. Kubrick, after all, made perhaps the most staggering anti-war movie of them all, 1987's Vietnam themed Full Metal Jacket.

Speaking of tributes, the controversy continues over the Academy's decision to present director Elia Kazan with its lifetime achievement award. Kazan, director of such films as On the Waterfront, was also notable for giving names of rumored Communists during the blacklisting in the 1950's.

If there's any justice in this world, Cate Blanchett will win the best actress award. No other performance in this decade was as powerful, versatile, and emotional as her's as the Virgin Queen. When we first see her in Elizabeth, she is shy and unsure of herself, and altogether unintimidating. But as the Queen reinvents herself, so does Blanchett — becoming strong and superior to all those around her.

Perhaps the pivotal moment in the transformation is when we see Blanchett alone in her room, practicing her speech in the mirror. The director cuts beautifully between the different versions of the speech, mixing a modern device with an old subject, and it all works beautifully.

Watch for Blanchett in The Talented Mr. Ripley, with Matt Damon and Gwyneth Paltrow, and directed by The English Patient's Anthony Mingehella.

Currently, three skate models are available for off-road use: the Coyote from Rollerblade and Big Cat and Enduro from Roces.

The Coyote started with a die-cast alloy frame specific to the model and mounted 6 x 1.25-inch pneumatic tires, pumped to 80 psi, on three 6-inch wheels to absorb shock.

But the Coyote's most unique feature is the ABTXtreme Brake. Applying forward pressure in the boot activates the drum brake by pulling on the boot cuff that connects to the linkage at the rear of the skate.

The no-holds-barred Big Cat uses a long-wheelbase alloy frame with two massive 110 x 43 mm two-piece wheels. The nylon hub is molded to the poured urethane treaded tire. Placing the wheels at each end, rather than underneath the skate, allows a lower center of gravity. The long wheelbase gives good directional stability, but at the expense of some maneuverability.

The Enduro is a cross between a conventional inline skate and the Big Cat. It is designed for kinder, gentler off-road experiences such as those on rough pavement, grass and packed trails. With a shorter wheelbase, it rides on three 90 mm lightweight off-road wheels.

The skating technique for off-roading is really closer to that for downhill skiing than for inline skating. Both companies run demo clinics on snowless ski slopes to hook new riders, and skiers seem to get the hang of it more easily than conventional skaters.

Prices for off-road skates are high because of low sales volume, but they are coming down. Rollerblade's Coyote has dropped to $350 from $500. The Big Cat sells for $425, and the Enduro is $325.

Compare these prices with $180 and less for inline streeters.

What you get for your money with the off-roaders is not only the cool hardware, but the adrenaline rush that goes with it.

Colin Firth of Shakespeare in Love is just part of the talented, Oscar-nominated cast.

national champions, Tennessee.

The versatility of 6-foot-2 inch Holdsclaw alone is what makes her such a potent weapon. After working hard to improve her strength in the off-season, it would be Holdsclaw's final piece to her string of eight national championships, a streak which she began as a high school freshman. Point guard Jolly wouldn't have it any other way than to close out her collegiate career with a fourth banner. The Vols' overbearing experience mixed in with Summitt's fierce competitiveness should set them apart as long as they remain sharp in the early rounds.

with 10.9 points while dishing out 5.9 assists. Coyner also played the role of "Ironwoman," logging 36.2 minutes per game, easily the highest on the squad.

A healthy Van Huisen will certainly be expected to alleviate Coyner more next season, being that she may be the next-best ball handler for the Maroon and White.

The young contingent showed signs of a promising future for UMass as well, particularly Nekole Smith, who assumed the role of starting center during the latter half of the season.

Smith, who combines a silky smooth jump shot, with tenacious inside play, finished third in team scoring with 9.4 points and fourth in rebounding at 5.3 a game. The Ann Arbor, Mich. native will likely be a focal point of the UMass offense heading into next year, with an obvious void being left by the three departing front-court players.

Smith's freshman counterpart in the post, Caroline Nehls, will also look to make her presence felt next season, after battling a stress fracture for the greater part of this year.

Nehls showed flashes of her capabilities despite the injury, scoring 4.3 points and grabbing 3.5 'bounds per game.

The infusion of Tonta Thomas to the UMass ranks was also a positive, as she provided a relentless spark in the form of her long-range shooting, marked by a 45 percent accuracy from behind the arc.

The combination of Thomas, with a year in the UMass system under her belt, and the crafty Jayvana Bradley playing in her final year, could be lethal in regards to next year's bench.

Even with this well-rounded effort, it will be hard for the players to overlook the fact that they fully expected to return to the NCAA tournament for the second straight year, and the third time in school history.

"It was a roller-coaster ride all year," O'Brien said. "I am confident that we will start fresh next season and return to doing the things that we hope to do as a team."

Yankees skipper Torre diagnosed with cancer

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) — New York Yankees manager Joe Torre left the World Series champions yesterday for treatment of prostate cancer, another blow to a team shadowed by death and disease. Torre discovered he had the cancer from a test the Yankees required at spring training in response to Darryl Strawberry's colon-cancer diagnosis in October.

The team believes doctors caught the disease in its early stages, and owner George Steinbrenner said he expects Torre back in 30 days — which would be April 9, the day of the Yankees' home-opener.

"I feel fine, and I am looking forward to taking care of this problem and getting back to work," said the 58-year-old manager, who spent the day at his spring home in Tampa.

It was not immediately clear what his course of treatment will be or where he will be treated.

Word of Torre's condition came two days after Yankees great Joe DiMaggio died of complications from lung-cancer surgery and on the same day Strawberry returned to the lineup for the first time in five months.

"It's been a very tough week for the Yankees but we'll be able to handle it," said Steinbrenner, who visited Torre and found him in good spirits. "We have a great capacity of being able to deal with adversity. Time after time after time, we've done it throughout this franchise's history. It's built into being a Yankee."

Just last week, former Yankees star Catfish Hunter appeared at the team's camp too weak to shake hands because of Lou Gehrig's Disease.

In 1996, when Torre became the Yankees' manager, his brother Rocco died, and his brother Frank had a heart transplant during the World Series.

Strawberry said the team was "devastated" by the news of Torre.

"No one wants to see someone else face this particular battle," Strawberry said. "It is a difficult battle for anybody. We all have to realize that until there is a cure for cancer there are no guarantees."

The Yankees, whose regular season begins April 5 at Oakland, will rotate managers while Torre is out.

Hitting coach Chris Chambliss managed the split squad game yesterday in Fort Myers against the Red Sox and Stump Merrill, who managed the Yankees in 1990-91 and is now a special assistant to general manager Brian Cashman, handled the team's other game in Bradenton against the Pirates.

Services set for Joe DiMaggio

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — At Sts. Peter and Paul Church, where Joe DiMaggio received his first communion and was wedded to his first wife, arrangements were being completed for today's private funeral of the Yankee Clipper.

Church organist Lola Simi, who will be joined by two singers for the funeral service, was preparing "Amazing Grace" and Schubert's "Ave Maria" among five musical works requested by the DiMaggio family.

The ornate church, dark and solemn despite the light filtering through its stained-glass windows, has been visited by President Lyndon Johnson and Vice President Walter Mondale. It also was the site of funeral services for former San Francisco Mayor Joseph Alioto.

The church, whose twin steeples tower over the North Beach neighborhood in which DiMaggio spent most of his childhood, will be closed to the public this morning.

Only about 40-50 relatives and close friends will be invited to listen to Father Armand Oliveri lead the service for DiMaggio, who died Monday at his Florida home at the age of 84.

There were no indications at the church entrance that a dignitary was about to be eulogized there. There was no mention of DiMaggio on a bulletin board announcing the times for masses in English, Italian and Chinese.

But the area surrounding the church was alive with activity Wednesday. Scaffolding for TV cameras already had been set up in Washington Square, a park facing the church in which the American flag had been lowered to half staff.

Police barriers were stacked together, preparing to cordon off the area on today.

Inside Sts. Peter and Paul, secretary Aurora Piazza leafed through a church book to a two-page spread of DiMaggio and actress Dorothy Arnold from their wedding on Nov. 19, 1939. Piazza, who grew up in North Beach, waited outside the church on that autumn day 60 years ago to catch a glimpse of the newlyweds.

DiMaggio's estranged son, Joseph Paul DiMaggio Jr., will be one of the pallbearers carrying the casket from the church after the service. The funeral procession will pass DiMaggio's former home on Beach Street on its way to Holy Cross Cemetery in nearly Colma. Joe Jr., who had not talked with his dad in two years, was DiMaggio's only child.

His mother was Dorothy Arnold, whom DiMaggio divorced in 1943. DiMaggio wed Marilyn Monroe in 1954 and they divorced later that year.

Women's gym ready to face Stanford Cardinal

By Matt Melo
Collegian Staff

The stretch run begins now for the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team as they are set to travel to the West Coast to do battle with No. 15 Stanford tomorrow in Palo Alto, Ca.

The Minutewomen (9–4 overall, 4–0 Atlantic–10) can make some waves in the gymnastics world with a strong outing versus the Cardinal. Stanford (8–3, 4–2 Pacific–10) is coming off of a huge upset loss at the hands of the Wildcats of Arizona.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Mandy Mosby

Stanford fell to Arizona by a count of 94.050–193.425, getting handed their second loss in their last three meets. The other defeat was dealt out by the University of Washington, who squeaked out the victory by a slim quarter of a point, 194.75–194.50.

"So now we are going to Stanford. With all the travel that is involved, and they are a top–ranked team, so it will be a really good meet for us. We are going to throw all of our power at them. We were unable to do that against Michigan and Alabama," Massachusetts' women's gymnastics coach Dave Kuzara said. "This weekend is the big weekend for us. We are going to put it all on the line."

On the other hand, the Minutewomen have been nothing short of amazing lately. Last week's dismantling of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Yale and Bridgeport on Senior Day typifies how far this team has come since the season got underway.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Anita Sanyal

Senior Anita Sanyal did most of the dirty work, placing first in two events, and ironwoman Michelle LoPresti won the all–around competition for the Maroon and White. The cast of Jill Fisher, Jennifer Pokrana, and Mandy Mosby could all provide fits for the Cardinal when competition gets going on Friday.

Despite the losing skid, Stanford possess some of the class of the gymnastics circuit. As a team, they rank fourth in the nation on the uneven bars, anchored by senior co–captain Amy Murakami.

Sophomore Jenny Wilson has not received a score under a 9.750 on any event she has entered, while Murakami has not dipped under 9.750 in 17 of her last 23 events. Canadian import Jen Exaltacion has shredded the competition on her way to school records on the beam with a 9.975 and a career high in the all–around with a 39.075.

Stanford coach Mark Cook, though, has to be a bit weary of what the Minutewomen have accomplished here in the East.

UMass isn't about to be intimidated by any opponent that they share the mats with. The University of Alabama came into Curry Hicks Cage wearing a No. 1 ranking in February and found the going to be a little rougher than expected, barely boarding the bus with a win.

The Minutewomen need to match that career day they posted and surpass it by tallying new highs in each and every category, including a team score of 193.850.

There are a few intriguing matchups that could make or break this meet for the Minutewomen. Sanyal will have to continue her success on the beam, as she will do battle with Exaltacion. The floor is where UMass could break it wide open. Fisher, Sanyal, Mosby, Jubi Goldberg and Kyla Palombini have all scored a 9.850 on the floor at one point this season. Stanford's floor exercise contingent has been disappointing, with Sarah Harding the only bright spot. She scored a 9.875 to win the event for the Cardinal last week against Arizona, but none of her teammates followed her lead.

The aforementioned uneven bars is where the Minutewomen need to steal some valuable points. Jen Wilson and Exaltacion anchor Stanford in bars, which has carried them through this season. UMass counters with Pokrana, LoPresti, and Mosby on the bars, where ironically the team holds their highest event score with a 48.900.

UMass coach Dave Kuzara looks to have his team primed for a challenge from Stanford, as well as the trip to the West Coast in general.

Women's crew off to Ireland for 1999 opener

By Jimmy Chen
Collegian Staff

Talk about looking forward to spring break.

The Massachusetts women's crew team have themselves a perfect plan: the three–time Atlantic 10 champions are set to compete in Galway, Ireland, at the Head of the Corrinn for their season opener.

"We are using this as a spring board for the rest of season," UMass assistant coach Kate Hubbard said.

In fact, they want this race, which features fierce competition from the British National team, to set the tone for the Minutewomen as they start at what Hubbard hopes will be a great season.

The Minutewomen were ranked fourth nationally at the end of last year, and they are a serious contender for the NCAA's this year. They are currently ranked 10th in an informal coaches poll. The Minutewomen are right up there with the elites of the sport, such as the University of Virginia and the University of Washington.

"The depth of our team [this year] is tremendous [compared to] any other year," Hubbard said. "We have 20 really strong women this year, whereas last year we were [only] working with half of that."

That's not bad considering last year's team was one of the strongest teams in the nation and in the history of UMass. But talking to head coach Jim Dietz and Hubbard, one gets a sense that this year, they could be making history.

One other aspect that sets apart this team from the past is their dedication, heart, will and the love for their season, teammates and their game. They wake up at five o'clock in the morning, practicing through rowing machines and weight–training two hours a day, seven days a week. During the winter break, when practically everyone else got a chance to rest, the Minutewomen traveled to Florida for rigorous training, working out three times a week.

"In Florida, we got a lot of miles [of rowing] in," Hubbard said. "It helped a lot [in perfecting the team because] they needed to get some strokes in, and the more strokes that they can take, the better prepared they get at the line."

Last year, it was like a train starting up. The beginning of the season was kind of slow, and it took us a while to get going," Hubbard added. "But Jim [Dietz] would like us to start with a little more speed this year."

This year's team has a lot of firepower, but one of the big concerns is that they do not have enough time to work with one another by going though the rowing motion. Since coming back from Florida, they have only been able to get water time for two days due to the weather.

"We felt powerful individually," senior captain Neyla Leslie said before the winter break. "We just need to row powerfully together."

Added Hubbard: "We [also] need to be able to get out on the water. Once we get on the water, we can figure things out. Racing experience is going to help them [get through this]. We got a lot of strength and experience women in the first boat."

In the first boat of varsity heavyweight, the lineup has been set with a core that brings up talks about the possibility that this is the best team ever. Six women in the first boat have hit national marks in the rowing machine. Senior Tamara Saratlic and sophomore Amy Lawless, joined with Leslie, are the returners from 1997 NCAA silver medal squad.

"Neyla has been drawing everybody together and just [trying to] get everyone working as a team and really get used to working with each other," Hubbard said.

The other three women in the core are junior Francesca Beaudoin, junior Verena Loch and freshman Sarah Pollman.

"[Francesca] was in the fourth [boat] last year. She has just made a tremendous gain in strength and has spent a lot of time out on the water, trying to improve her rowing stroke," Hubbard said. "She has just come a long way and really has inspired a lot of people on the team."

Adding to the elites is the coxswain, who is like a point guard to a basketball team, sophomore Sara Praghuski.

"[Sara] is extremely important to the team, she is the one to decide what strategy to use," Hubbard said. "She and Chrissy [DeRunk] (the second boat coxswain) are the top–notched coxswains in the country."

DeRunk, who has been a coxswain for many men's teams, leads the second unit with six returnees from last year's team.

"We got a lot of women back from last year [in the second unit] that are used to rowing with each other and they have a great sense of team," Hubbard said. "I think [our second boat] is a lot faster than last year."

Leading this unit are seniors Dawn Stanfield and Kathy Arvidson and sophomores Heather Walker, Mary Neubecker, Julie Vander Ploeg and Kate Tynan.

In the lightweight boat, the Minutewomen, who will not participate in the season opener, will receive their first competitions in April when they will take part in the Kenneck Cup, the Atlantic 10 tournament and the IRA tournament.

People to watch in that unit are captain Renee Domina and senior Melissa Allen. But the story with lightweight goes to freshman, Sarah Weller and Kelley Tiarks, along with some other freshmen depending on the performance, will help the UMass lightweight crew team and turn them into a championship contender.

"This freshman group is going to inject some great light into a lightweight program," Hubbard said. "They already are making some noise."

And very soon, the UMass women's crew team is hoping to make some noise not only in the nation, but across the globe.

A pair of UM gymnasts pick up ECAC honors

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

After a weekend of outstanding competition during which the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team defeated Army and won the New England Championships for the fifteenth time in the last sixteen years, the Minutemen saw two members of their team earn ECAC honors.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Jeff LaVallee

Junior Jeff LaVallee was named ECAC Division I Men's Gymnast of the Week as he won four events and the all–around title in the Minutemen's 225.600–214.200 victory over Army last Friday.

The Connecticut native earned an impressive 57.800 all–around total and broke the school record on the parallel bars with a near–perfect score of 9.90.

On Sunday, LaVallee led UMass to its eleventh consecutive New England Championship while totaling a 56.375 all–around and tying his own school record on the high bar with a 9.85.

The former U.S. National team member is currently ranked No. 6 in the country in the all–around competition, proving that he will be a threat to his competitors at NCAA Regionals and Nationals this year.

Also on the awards list for the weekend was sophomore Michael Alexander, who was named ECAC Division I Men's Rookie of the Week.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Michael Alexander

As the first man up for UMass on Friday on both of his specialty events, Alexander set the tone for his team with career–high scores of 9.50 on vault and 9.40 on high bar.

The Virginia native is certainly making an impression on the rest of his team and with improved consistency and precision, has the potential to become conference champion on either event.

Alexander red–shirted last year but has come back with a vengeance to help push his team toward NCAA Regionals.

Both Alexander and LaVallee will join the rest of the Minutemen in New Haven, Conn. next Thursday as they go head–to–head with the Southern Connecticut State University Owls.

Pac–10 supporters outclass UMass fans by plenty

Matt O'Neill

Now that the madness of March is upon us, I would like to take a moment to discuss the student support for the Massachusetts men's basketball program. As a domestic exchange student from the University of Oregon, I was excited to come here and see an upper–end Division 1 program compete.

One of the major criteria that I took into consideration when choosing what school to attend was how good the basketball program was. I had a choice between the University of Connecticut and the University of Massachusetts, and I chose UMass because of the recent success enjoyed here.

I figured that since the team was making it to the "Big Dance" every year, that the William D. Mullins Center would be packed with both students and alumni alike.

Coming from a lower–end Pacific–10 school, I was anxious to see the student support for a "big time" basketball school. Being a program that is only three years removed from the Final Four, I expected to see great student support.

With a ranking in the Top 25 at the beginning of the season (No. 21) and big wins in nationally televised games, like Kansas, I was hoping for an experience that I had only heard about and seen on ESPN.

I always wanted to see a game where Dick Vitale would rant and rave about "glass cleen" and "elevator men." I thought that UMass basketball games would give me the experience that I was missing at Oregon.

At Oregon, students packed "The Pit" for every game, and I was expecting no less than that here at UMass. However, to my dismay, there were many seats left empty when I went to my first game of the season. Granted, it was against Fordham, but I was still disappointed, to say the least.

Back at Oregon, it did not matter who the opponent was. McArthur Court would be packed, many times having students waiting outside for hours before the game. Even against teams like Washington State or Southern California the students would still be talking about the game for days before hand.

For big games in the Pac–10, like when UCLA or Arizona came to town, student seats sell out in about two or three hours. If you want to get a good seat, you better line up hours ahead of time.

It was not only the student support, or lack thereof, but it was also the lack of excitement before hand. There was not an air of anticipation like there should be for a major Division I basketball game.

In Eugene, Ore., the fans would be buzzing with anticipation for the game. The students would be already yelling taunts and defaming the day's opponents.

The only time that I got a remote hint of what I was expecting was against Temple in the final home game, but even that was a letdown, though, because it was Senior Day.

Every year, when "Senior Night" rolls around in Eugene, tickets for the games are hard to come by. You better get them early or forget about going.

If schools and programs like Oregon can have great student support, schools like UMass should have the same. For a school like UMass, where there is a rich history of great basketball, there is no reason why students should not pack the Mullins Center each and every game night.

Ski team ready for U.S.S.A. Nationals

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

The eight–week season of dizzying highs and disappointing lows weathered by the Massachusetts men's ski team in 1999 will culminate this weekend in the United States Ski Association Nationals, set to unfold at Mammoth Mountain, Ca.

The Minutemen will send five representatives to race in the West Coast meet, led by senior All–American captain Thomas Holden. The Carrabassett Valley graduate rose to the challenge of leading a relatively young team this season, letting his five top–three slalom runs set the standard for excellence.

And while the intensely competitive Holden may not be the most vocal of captains, his mastery of the sport allows him to lead most effectively by example.

"It's hard to get five words out of Thomas," freshman teammate Ken Thoman said. "He does his talking on the course."

As for Thoman, the New York native has employed his years of racing savvy in becoming a fiercely fast giant slalom competitor. Pacing the team with seven top–10 runs on the year, the Lebanon, Ohio graduate hopes to use the Mammoth Mtn. tourney to attract recognition for the school and program.

"There are a ton of talented skiers looking for programs where they can create an immediate impact," Thoman said.

Fellow Maroon and White marauder Christian Guertin qualifies as such a competitor. The junior from Ashburnham transferred to UMass from Vermont's Norwich University, a school devoid of a ski team. As one of only two skiers to finish in every race of the regular season, Guertin's seemingly laid–back manner may be his best weapon in such a competitive field.

"We're just psyched to be making the trip," said the Oakmont Regional graduate, who learned the ins and outs of the sport at nearby Wachusett Mountain.

Teammate Rich Granger's road to collegiate skiing success was markedly different; the freshman from Princeton, NJ was highly recruited out of St. John's High last year. The former split end and track star's boundless athleticism is certainly one explanation for his breakout rookie campaign.

"I challenge myself by setting difficult but reachable goals," Granger said. "I even plan on trying out for the football team here next season."

One way or another, though, Granger seems intent on tasting success at a National level.

The Minutemen's top five is rounded out by sophomore Mike Hadden. The native of Westfield chalked up several solid performances for UMass this year, highlighted by dual 15th place runs in the slalom and GS at the Smith College Invitational back in mid–February.

Hadden also holds the notable distinction of being the only Minuteman to compete in every regular season meet during the past two seasons. That experience will undoubtedly translate into more composure and discipline on the course at Mammoth.

The voice of true experience that guides UMass skiing is that of coach Bill MacConnell, in his 38th season at the program's helm. The 80 year–old skipper has seen his teams capture 18 conference titles and place four men on All– American teams since 1961.

"Coach MacConnell is the glue that keeps the team from unraveling," Holden said. "It is amazing how he keeps going."

Thoman agrees, and scoffs at the idea of MacConnell retiring.

"He loves the team and sport, so why give it up?" he said. "The last word I'd use to describe Coach MacConnell is old."

So as the Minutemen prepare for their final assault on the 1999 college skiing season, they hope to bring one more jewel to their deeply respected coach's crown of achievements. And in doing so, the Maroon and White downhillers also hope to polish their own image, as the one of the premier young programs on the east coast.

Don't forget your ski boots... or the Collegian.

Markus Helanen has compiled an impressive Hockey East win–loss record (8–11–2). The Finnish native has collected 802 saves on the season while also putting up a 3.27 goals against average. Freshman netminder Mike Johnson has been stellar overall, as he has a 2.62 GAA, a save percentage of .913 and a 2–3 record, with both wins being shutouts.

The recent success on the road for the Minutemen has been a great confidence boost heading into this three game series at Alfond Arena. The Minutemen, in their last four road games, won their first two Hockey East road games during the stretch run, and played Providence and UMass– Lowell to a pair of one goal losses.

"Not only did we win those two games late in the year on the road, but we also lost two one goal games to Providence and Lowell. A lot of those games were played in small rinks, so we should be used to it," Mallen said. "We got to be able to match Maine's intensity because they are a very intense team at home and some of those guys are going to come out all fired up."

The Minutemen will be looking to make an impact on the Black Bears tonight and press the Black Bears in a playoff situation. The last time Maine was swept out of the playoffs in the quarterfinal round was in 1994, when the BU Terriers defeated Maine 8–5 and 4–3.

LA losing Forum; Southeast division struggles to win

The Great Western Forum has eight home games left, and will be host to some of next year's preseason games, but in the last regular season home game, fans will leave with a commemorative puck and possibly one of the players jerseys.

Paul Teves the NHL

But more importantly, they will know that they just left a building which represents the strength of hockey in Southern California.

Since 1967 the Los Angeles Kings have been playing in what truly was a hockey experiment. It has been home to the likes of Marcel Dionne, Wayne Gretzky, Dave Taylor and Luc Robitaille. It has also seen greats like Eric Lindros, Bobby Orr, Charlie Simmer and Mario Lemieux. But as all good things do, the Forum will come to an end. They will play in the new Staples Center come 1999–2000, but their experiment was a huge success. Now the NHL has accepted franchises in Florida, Tampa Bay, Anaheim, San Jose and Carolina.

Important dates in Forum history:

In 1983, the Kings played in their only Stanley Cup and fell to the Montreal Canadiens. On March 23, 1994, the legend Wayne Gretzky scored his 802nd career goal to become the NHL's all-time leading goal–scorer.

On April 10, 1982, the Kings played the most exciting game in Forum history when they came back from a 5–0 deficit in the third period to beat Edmonton in overtime in the playoffs.

• The Anaheim Mighty Ducks have continued to improve. They are currently on a seven game winning streak. Paul Kariya and Teemu Selanne continue to pour in the points and my sleeper in Anaheim just downed the No. 3 team in the Western Conference, the Detroit Redwings, 2–1 on Sunday night.

• Colorado right winger Theo Fleury is expected to resume skating later this week. The Avs's are saying that there is a chance he might be in uniform for a game with archrival Detroit. Meanwhile, the Flames are 2–1 without Fleury's help. They have counted more on the likes of Cory Stillman, who has stepped up with three goals in three games.

The Avalanche have also been monitoring the steady progress of Peter Forsberg (elbow). They feel that he might be ready to play even sooner then expected. It is possible that he may take the ice today against Philadelphia.

• The aforementioned Redwings are very close to signing Steve Yzerman to a deal that would keep him in Detroit through the 2002–2003 season. That would also make him a twenty year member of the Wings.

• Bill Guerin has apparently regained his scoring touch. He has tallied four goals in the Oilers last four games. But it seems like Guerin has regained his touch — and that is crucial for the Edmonton, who sits four games under .500 and in seventh place in the conference. The return of Jason Arnott from early injuries has also helped restore Edmonton as a contender in the playoff race.

• Byron "the bum" Dafoe faked everybody out two nights ago as he collected a 2–0 shutout win over the Florida Panthers who are in tenth place in the Eastern Conference. Dafoe made 19 saves in his shutout effort, but you can feel pretty confident that mister inconsistency will brick the next one. Dafoe will certainly have his opportunities bornb when the Bruins play five of the next six games on the road.

In that 2–0 win for the B's, Jason Allison, Dimitri Kristich and Ray Bourque each tallied two points.

• Wayne Gretzky will be out of the Rangers lineup at least another week because of the neck and spine injury that he suffered. Gretzky, out since Feb. 26, will be shot with Cortizone for the next couple of days to see how he responds. The Rangers will desperately need Gretzky's help if they look to make a run at the playoffs. They currently sit at .500 and only trail the eighth place Bruins by two points in the Eastern Conference.

His replacement Petr Nedved has been spectacular since taking over for the boys from New York.

• The Flyers might have acquired Adam Burt from Carolina in a trade because of the recent stomach problems with veteran defenseman Eric Desjardins, who has missed four straight games and six total this season. The Flyers struggle when he isn't in the line up, going an atrocious 0–3–3.

The Flyers didn't get–off free, though. They sent journeymen, Andrei Kovalenko to the Hurricanes. Kovalenko scored for the 'Canes in his debut.

• My final thoughts this week is a direct criticism of the NHL. For those of you who don't know, they realigned the division. There are no longer Adams and Patrick Divisions, etc., but they need to do a better job than putting the Panthers, the Capitals, Tampa Bay and Carolina in the same division. Three of those teams are under .500, and the division holds a record of 94–124–40 overall and has played each to a 14–14–14 record. Thank goodness they have each other. There is your story. I dare you to find a worse division in any sport.

UMass hockey heads north tonight

Minutemen to open up HE quarterfinals against Maine

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team will head to Orono, Me. tonight to start a best–of–three–game playoff series with the No. 4 ranked University of Maine Black Bears (25–5–4, 17– 5–2 in Hockey East) in the Hockey East quarterfinal round.

Although Maine holds a 14–2–2 advantage in the series between the two teams all–time, UMass has already made their impression felt with the Black Bears earlier this season when they beat them 2–1 on Nov. 11. The Minutemen then tied the Bears the next night 1–1 to complete a pair of games at the William D. Mullins Center.

Having beaten Maine already this season will factor in as a huge advantage for the Minutemen. The only other teams that managed to win against them this season were New Hampshire, Boston College and Boston University. They finished the weekend series with Maine having taken three out of four points from the No. 4 team in the nation.

"We are the only team besides UNH that has done any real damage to Maine's record. And they have been talking about that all year — they been talking about that lost weekend up in Amherst; that bitter disappointment," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "The pressure is all on them, there is no pressure on us... We have put ourselves in position to be successful and we just have to go out and stick to our game plan."

UMass has done a good job of keeping the Black Bears' best players in check in their three meetings this season. Steve Kariya, Cory Laroue, David Cullen and Dan Kerluke have been held under their normal scoring outputs, which have been very high this season.

Kariya has been held to only one goal in three games against the Minutemen, but his only goal did come in the game at Alfond Arena.

"I think we have been able to neutralize Maine really well. I don't think they like to play against the trap. I think they find it difficult. They have great forwards on their team who can't carry the puck up ice against the trap," Mallen said. "That's one way to keep the puck off Steve Kariya's stick."

One of the major concerns for the Minutemen heading into this best two–out–of–three–game set with Maine has to be with the power play. The Minutemen have gone a dismal 0– 11 in the last two games with the man advantage. UMass has scored more goals shorthanded in the last two Hockey East contests than they have while on the power play.

"We have practiced the power play everyday this season, and we have a lot of young guys and they're not used to the pressure put on them by the pressure of college hockey penalty kill. They need to learn the difference between college and high school and juniors," Mallen said. "We have had some success some nights and we just need some guys to really improve their vision with the pucks and get some rebounds."

Mallen is not only concerned with the special teams but also with the overall play of his team, including on the even–strength situations.

"I think the key to the game is probably going to be the special teams. If we can stay in with them on the even– strength situations and we can stop their power play or be better then them on our power play, then we should be alright," he said.

The strategy in net for the Minutemen this weekend has not yet been decided by Mallen, but he did comment about his two stellar goaltenders and what they will be able to offer to the team in Orono.

"It depends on Alfie Michaud. If he goes three nights, then there is no great advantage if Markus is fresh and we are changing goalies. We want to put ourselves in a position to win. If Markus fields a lot of shots, and we think Mike can come in and help us out then that's fine," he said. "There will be a lot of strategy on the first two nights. But it's great that we have Mike in case, knowing that he can step right in."

While the Massachusetts hockey team will need to work as a unit to beat Maine in the Hockey East quarterfinals, the Minutemen will need individual efforts from players like sophomore Kris Wallis [right] along the way.

UT set to lead the women's pack

The story of this year's women's NCAA basketball tournament is Chamique Holdsclaw and the Tennessee Volunteers. Playing in the Southeastern Conference, which, by the way, is proving its mythical strength by sending seven other teams to the dance (Alabama, Auburn, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana State and Mississippi State), the Volunteers are looking to win their fourth national championship in four tries.

Cathleen Ralls

Last year the Vols let loose on Louisiana Tech in the final, winning 93–75 with Holdsclaw nabbing her second straight tournament MVP.

This year, Tennessee has suffered two losses, including one to La. Tech in the final regular season game, en route to a 28–2 record and a No. 1 seeding in the East Region.

Tennessee should rid themselves of No. 16 Appalachian State in the first round, but could have a rude awakening in the second round against fellow SEC member No. 5 Auburn, who lost to the Vols by just eight points on February 14. Also standing in their way are No. 2 Old Dominion and No. 3 Duke, who are waiting in the wings, ready to trounce the divas of college hoops.

The other No. 1 seeds go something like this; a feisty Purdue team (28–1) is slated in the Midwest and a replenished UConn squad (27–4) in the Mideast is in search of their second title in the 90's. Also, back for another shot is La. Tech (26–2) in the West.

Geno Auriemma's Huskies suffered several losses in the middle portion of their season due to injuries, but have won the last 12 of 15 games, downing teams by a 30–point spread. Look for Svetlana Abrosimova, the Big East Player of the Year, leading scorer Shen Ralph (17.4 points per game) and Tamika Williams at the Final Four in San Jose, Calif. The Florida International Golden Panthers might strike some fear in the hungry Huskies in the second round but it should be the Bulldogs of the SEC raising Cain with the Huskies in the regional final.

Purdue is riding a 26–game winning streak after squeaking by Illinois to repeat as Big Ten Tournament champions. First team consensus All–American Stephanie White–McCarty scored 31 points en route to being named MVP of the conference.

Sheryl Swoopes' alma mater, No. 2 Texas Tech, a team that was on the bubble for a No. 1 bid, should be viewed as a Final Four contender as well. No. 3 Rutgers and No. 6 Arizona also look to shake things up in the Midwest. One team who is seeking a title with experience is No. 5 Alabama, who relies on the shoulders of Dominique Canty (20 ppg), and should knock out No. 12 Grambling to face No. 4 North Carolina. This game is a toss up, but either way, Purdue should overcome to take the regional title.

The Lady Techsters are hell–bent on breaking the Tennessee tradition and have proven they are worthy by defeating the Golden Panthers (23–6) for their fourth straight Sun Belt title.

Nonetheless, they have tough competition in No. 3 UCLA, who should have no problem defeating first round opponent No. 14 Wisconsin–Green Bay and SEC survivor Kentucky, who were 500 in conference. WAC Player of the Year Becky Hammon, the nation's eighth leading scorer, leads the No. 4 Colorado State Rams and could upstart La. Tech to take their inaugural trip to the Final Four.

Some local teams have also qualified through winning their conference tournaments. Bill Gibbon's Holy Cross Crusaders should fade gracefully to the Duke Blue Devils in the first round. The No. 7 seeded Maine squad might upstart the once rosy Cardinal of Stanford. Methuen's Jamie Cassidy is the sixth leading scorer in the nation, averaging 23.7 ppg. The Black Bears will have to face No. 2 Old Dominion in the second round, but they shouldn't be crossed off. Other local teams in the Big Dance include Boston College and Northeastern.

The Atlantic 10 sent four schools to the big dance. Unfortunately, its best bet, Virginia Tech (26–2), is seeded fourth in the East and will have to beat Auburn in the first round to face Tennessee. No. 11 St. Joseph's (22–7), who won the A–10 title, shouldn't be a problem for No. 6 seeded Tulane. The No. 8 Xavier Musketeers (23–8) received the same fate as the Hokies, as they must beat Florida Int. to play UConn in the second round.

The Final Four should weigh out to be Tennessee versus Purdue in the East with UConn and Colorado St. battling in the West. UConn will come on strong but Colorado St. just might diminish the Huskies' plot for a second title. Purdue should end their dream season with a loss to the eventual

Minutewomen seeking better results next year

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

Having been denied an NIT berth, the Massachusetts women's basketball team's season has officially concluded, leaving plenty of unfulfilled dreams and shattered emotions in the wake.

"It was a very tough year for the team physically and emotionally," Massachusetts women's basketball coach Joanie O'Brien said. "It was especially disappointing not to qualify for the post–season, because you don't want to end up like we did against Xavier in the Atlantic 10 tournament."

The Musketeers eliminated UMass handily in the quarterfinals of the conference tournament, in a game that came on the heels of a tumultuous year both on and off the court for the Minutewomen.

Injury trouble plagued the team throughout the season, most notably when sophomore guard Kelly Van Huisen went down in the third game against Kansas with her second torn anterior cruciate ligament in the last two years.

"There are very few players around that can make everything easier for their teammates around them," O'Brien said. "Kelly is one of those unique players, and we really missed that this year."

Additionally, the Minutewomen had to contend with distractions stemming from several sources petitioning against the coaching methods of O'Brien.

"Anytime you have to think about anything other than basketball, it can have a negative effect on the team as a whole," O'Brien said. "I think for the most part they were able to keep their focus, but it would have been impossible to ignore everything that was going on."

Despite these complications, the Minutewomen (16–14 overall, 11–5 Atlantic 10) admirably finished above .500 for the fifth straight year under the tutelage of O'Brien.

Unfortunately, the NIT commission did not see fit to extend a hand to the fifth best A–10 squad, after the fourth best team, George Washington, declined their invitation.

One would have figured the Minutewomen to be logical candidates to represent the A–10 in the NIT, but O'Brien points to a variety of factors in their eventual exclusion.

"Some of these things are political," O'Brien said. "But realistically we did not beat any teams that we weren't supposed to beat, and that may have hurt us."

The strength of schedule was high this year for UMass, but the Minutewomen simply did not come up with the quality victories that tournament committees crave when selecting participants.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Kelly Van Huisen

Another explanation lies in the fact that while there were four very strong teams in the A–10 this season, the lower portion of the conference was abysmal, lessening the value of UMass' 11–5 mark in the A–10.

The bottom four teams in the A–10–East combined for 14 wins, or as many as St. Joseph's, who won the division at a 14–2 clip.

"We need more balance in the conference to continue to earn respect," O'Brien said on the matter.

Individually, many UMass cagers turned in stellar seasons in helping to keep the ship afloat against a heavy tide.

Senior captain Tez Kraft led the Minutewomen with 13.4 points per game, while hauling in 7.6 rebounds a contest. Fellow seniors Yolanda Rayside, and Lucia Madajova were solid contributors, with Madajova's vast improvement the most clear–cut surprise of the campaign.

After playing sparingly in her first three seasons, Madajova stepped into a starting role and averaged six points and a team–leading 7.6 boards, barely edging Kraft.

Alison MacFarland became more consistent in her offensive production while remaining a force on defense, averaging 9.1 points and 1.2 steals per night.

"Alison had her most solid season this year for us," O'Brien said. "She played very much within herself."

Furthermore, sophomore Kathy Coyner was a steady influence in her first year as the team's point guard. She chipped in on all facets of offense,

Women's tennis heads to Fla.

By Matt O'Neill
Collegian Correspondent

It will not be all fun in the sun for the Massachusetts women's tennis team on their trip to Florida. Over their spring break trip to the Sunshine State, the team will be concentrating and preparing for their upcoming match against Syracuse while the rest of their peers are relaxing on the beach.

On Tuesday, March 16, the Minutewomen will take on a highly–talented Syracuse Orangewomen squad.

The health of the No. 6 singles player, Alison Tross, will be the key to the match.

"The bottom line is if Ali can come compete," UMass women's tennis coach Judy Dixon said. "If we are at full strength we have a good shot at winning."

Tross, who is recovering from a broken finger, is scheduled to see an orthopedic surgeon today. However, Dixon thinks that she will be doubtful for the match.

"They told us (Tross will be out) about two weeks," Dixon said. "It's really day–to–day. She still has pain when she hits the ball."

If Tross can't play, Dixon will play co–captain Gillian Kane in the number six spot.

"Gillian will take Aii's spot," Dixon said. "She will have to play well, because she usually plays doubles."

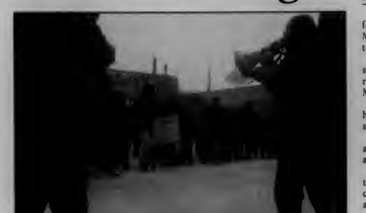
The Minutewomen will need strong play from the top of their order if they want to win.

"With Ola (Gerasimova) and Jackie (Braunstein) feeling better, we should have a strong showing from the top two," Dixon said.

If Tross can't go against Syracuse, Dixon and her squad will then be looking ahead to the Atlantic 10 tournament in April.

"Without Aii, our goal is the A–10's," Dixon said. "The bottom line is we want to get her back for the (Atlantic 10) tournament."

The Orangewomen are a similar team to a Brown team that UMass faced earlier this season.



"Syracuse is full of foreign players," Dixon said, "And they play a similar style to Brown, so they will be somewhat familiar to us."

For UMass, the trip down south will help them get one last shot at preparation before the Atlantic 10 season.

Protestors raise screws in anger

ROBERTO DELGADO / COLLEGIAN

Students partake in yesterday's rally in front of the Student Union.

By Danielle Fugazy
Collegian Staff

Actions spoke louder than words yesterday when students silently marched to the Whitmore Administration Building in protest of the change to University of Massachusetts admissions policy.

The Taskforce for Equal Opportunity and Access and supporters marched from the Students Union steps to Whitmore in two lines. When they got there everyone held a screw up in the air and chanted together "Don't Screw Our Future." Then the marchers dropped their screws into a bucket that read "Stop Screwing with Our Future" and silently walked back to the Student Union Steps.

Kiya Stokes, a graduate student senator, warned demonstrators that the rally was just the beginning. "It's been a dress rehearsal; if these issues aren't met by the 23rd, we'll let them know we mean business."

Stokes also explained why a silent march was the way the task force decided to proceed. "People said you're [the task force] a violent group. We could be, but in a war it's the disciplined soldiers that win."

The Taskforce wrote a letter listing its demands and demanded an administrative resolution in the form of a

Students meet to plan action

Administration warned to adhere to demand deadline

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A heated debate dissolved into a discussion of what forms of actions would be taken if the University of Massachusetts administration fails to agree to a moratorium over the issue of affirmative action.

The deadline set for the administration to temporarily stop its decision to change admissions practices and return to its former race–oriented admissions policy, is March 23 at 5 p.m.

If demands aren't met by that time, the protestors have resolved to turn up the level of protest, graduate student senator Kiya Stokes said.

"We are not saying that we are going to engage in acts of civil disobedience," Stokes said. "[However] it is an option if demands aren't met."

Student advocates of affirmative action want a moratorium on admission practices until further resolutions can be discussed between the administration, students and faculty.

Members discussed reasons they felt the protests at Goodell two years ago (against the administration's failure to comply to agreements made to the minority community) could have been more successful.

Freshman environmental science major Edward Vale feels that if protestors participate in an act of civil disobedience, they should be educated on the proper ways to behave should the situation escalate to involve arrests.

"We could set up social disobedience workshops where people could come and talk about legal strategies, so if we decide to do this [act of civil disobedience], everything would be totally organized," Vale said.

"So if arrests are involved, a riot doesn't break out with students and officers getting hurt."

Stokes agreed to the need for an organized civil disobedience act, if one should arise, but did not comment on what kind of action the group plans to implement if their demands are not met. There was, however, discussion on the need to educate people of their rights to protest.

"We need to be sure we give all of the authorities in this situation a chance to negotiate," Stokes said. "Unless we get the old policy in place A.S.A.P., the more the next class will suffer."

History graduate student Richard Aviles felt the cause for affirmative action should be taken to the national level if it is to be recognized by the University.

"The most important thing to do is to win this nationally," Aviles said.

"We need to bring people over to our side and communicate to ourselves that our fight is righteous."

Student Government Association Attorney General Jesse Burchfield felt that no matter what scale the issue reaches, the protesters need to be careful not to rush into civil disobedience, as they did in the Goodell situation.

"You sort of feel compelled to say 'let's go,'" Burchfield said. "I'd rather do something and do it right and wait a few days instead of trying to do something so quickly."

"We made some most critical mistakes [at Goodell]," anthropology graduate student Tom Taaffe said. "It is important to establish a process in which people can feel included in the process."

Although organizers were reluctant to commit to acts of civil disobedience, they did not rule out the possibility.

"The deadline is for Tuesday, March 23," Stokes said. "The ball is in the Chancellor's [Scott] court."

Lustig dies of head injuries

University of Massachusetts student Allison Lustig, 19, of Shrewsbury, died yesterday at Baystate Medical Center as a result of head injuries sustained in a pedestrian car accident last Wednesday.

Lustig was a sophomore honors student, majoring in psychology and education. She was also a member of the color guard for the Minuteman Marching Band last fall, and played the flute in the University Concert Band this spring. She lived on campus in Webster Residence Hall.

George Parks, director of the Minuteman Marching Band, commented on Lustig's death in a University press release yesterday.

"She was a quiet, sweet person who loved the band," he said. He added that Lustig's death is "a real tragedy for the band and her friends. Our thoughts are with her family."

"Our sincerest sympathies are with Allison's family and friends," said Javier Cevallos, interim vice chancellor for student affairs.

Chaplains and counselors are available for support for all members of the campus community; Mental Health can be reached at 545–2337, and Dean of Students at 545–2684.

Amherst officials learn about keg stands

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST— Anatomically correct pictures, pre–party drinking and funneling alcohol were discussed yesterday afternoon as health educators demonstrated an Alcohol Education Workshop to a meeting of representatives from the town of Amherst and the University of Massachusetts.

The two–hour workshop is given to students who commit lesser violations of the alcohol policy.

The University and town police officers, Select Board members, town residents, UMass students and representatives from the Dean of Students Office who attended the Problem Solving Partnership meeting got a little taste of what it's like to be a student going through the Alcohol Education Workshop.

"We talk about drinking and driving with them and why it's dangerous. We talk about differences between men and women. We talk about safe sex or unsafe sex. When is someone sleeping it off [and] when it is dangerous. When to make that call [for help]," said Stephanie Miller, a graduate assistant alcohol educator who teaches the workshops.

The workshop, which is run through the Dean of Students Office and funded by a grant from the Board of Higher Education, is a result of the new alcohol policy sanctions that went into effect last semester.

"[It will] show people they don't know as much as they think about alcohol," said Tanis Elliott, a graduate assistant alcohol educator who also teaches the workshop.

Elliott and Miller wanted to demonstrate to those at the meeting how they get students involved during the workshop. They stressed that it is not a lecture but an interactive program that makes students talk and get involved.

The two women then had 11 people at the meeting stand up and hold various cards with pictures of various parts of the body. The individuals then had to get in the order they thought alcohol affected these parts.

The audience also participated in estimating how much an average woman and man drinks in a typical night of a partying. The exercise was intended to show the different affects alcohol has on men and women.

The meeting's participants estimated that a typical 175– pound man and a typical 140–pound woman would start drinking during a "pre–party" at 8 p.m. and finish the night with an "after hours" party at 4 a.m.

At the end of the night, the woman had had a total of five unmetabolized drinks in her bloodstream and the man had seven. Both, however had a blood alcohol level of 0.15.

Elliott and Miller also said that while a blood alcohol level of 0.15 would not be enough to risk the lives of the students, playing drinking games, "funneling" or doing "keg stands" during the night could put them in danger.

The two gave proof that students did find these exercises worthwhile by showing quotes students provided on a survey given at the end of the workshop.

"I actually found this interesting. I thought it was gonna be a 'go in the corner and stare at the wall' type of thing," wrote one student.

Assistant Dean of Students Paul Vasconcellos said more proof of the workshop's success was its student return rate.

"Our recidivism rate has been quite compelling... Out of 227 [students who have been in the workshop], only two have repeated."

Select Board member Hill Boss wanted to see it expanded.

"I think the system is working on campus... I would like to see the same [program] applied to all off–campus students," Boss said.

But sanctioned students weren't the only ones who participated in the workshop. Phi Sigma Kappa asked Elliott and Miller to come and teach the workshop to the fraternity.

"I think it's an excellent program... we had problems before [so] we chose to set it up," said Zack Lyons, the fraternity president. "Everyone [said beforehand] It will be really boring but there was a lot of interaction."

Third world sweatshops topic of Smith discussion

By Mary Miles
Collegian Staff

Sandra Ramos shared her experiences of the atrocities committed daily in sweatshops around the world in hopes of striking up activism from the Smith College audience on Monday.

As both a Nicaraguan human rights activist and textile industry worker, Ramos told students that only 10 percent of what the consumer pays for these brand names actually pays for labor and materials. The remaining 90 percent is strictly used for marketing and profit.

"We make Gap, Levis, Nike, Guess; very beautiful, all very beautiful," said Ramos.

Ramos spoke of the world consortium of free trade zones, areas in which industrial parks, staffed by women and children, exist in nearly every corner of the globe. These parks were allegedly created to generate employment, raise the standard of living, increase trade and improve human resources.

Nicaraguan women, tired of sweatshop labor and men's unemployment, collected 55,000 signatures asking for a code of conduct onto which all of the bosses of the factories signed. This code of conduct would prohibit child labor and would back an eight–hour workday. It would also call for safe working conditions.

Every one of the workers claimed that violence had been committed against them by their supervisors.

"People who don't know about the situation may ask why the government does not aid these women, but the fact of the matter is, with 85 percent of the population in poverty, out of which only 20 percent meet their basic needs, there is a huge gap between the rich and the poor. The government does not care about us," Ramos said.

Nicaragua has a foreign debt of over $6,000,000,000, the interest of which alone is $519,000,000. The IMF, forcing poor countries to compete with one another to be relieved of their debt, is calling all Third World countries to a conference in Stockholm this May. Nicaragua hopes to qualify for this relief, as Hurricane Mitch has done extensive damage to the country.

"When the United States needed cotton, the Nicaraguan fields were filled with cotton. When the U.S. needed coffee, the Nicaraguan fields were filled with coffee. All of our best shrimp and gold come to your country. We are a country rich in resources, but we do not see any of the benefit. It is time for you to help us," Ramos said.

Ramos spoke of actions students at the University of Colorado have taken, such as organizing to keep the campus store from carrying sweatshop–produced goods. When she asked if students knew whether or not their campus store carried sweatshop–produced goods, most students could not answer.

Ramos spoke of the importance of student activism. "I came here to give you hope, but instead you have given it to me."

She said that the future is born in the university because students are the economists, philosophers and senators of tomorrow. Ramos spoke of the slanted view of North Americans she had once subscribed to before her tour, and the new unflinching optimism that she would bring back to the Nicaraguan women at home.

"I heard that you were all serious, cold, and that you didn't smile. Here, I look at you, and all I see are smiles. Smiles this big, so big it scares me."

Store owners looking forward to Y2K glitch

By Jill Carroll

While the Y2K computer glitch has town officials and citizens scrambling to avert potential disaster, local business owners say their computers and stores will continue to party like it's 1999.

"If anything happened I think it would be fun," said Nat Herold, manager of Atticus/Albion Bookshop.

Y2K is the computer glitch that has governments and citizens alike concerned that there could be major breakdowns on Jan. 1, 2000 in electricity, water and other services because computers and programs cannot recognize the year 2000.

Town officials and citizens have discussed small business readiness during a series of reports, meetings and a forum on the Y2K issue, but the business owners don't seem quite as concerned.

"It's all blown out of proportion," said Frank Boyden, owner of Knowles Flower Shop.

Boyden said he only relies on a computer to send orders and the FTD floral company has assured him everything will be fine.

"I can always call. That's the way

Ellen Story debates admissions at UM

By Natty Yaqudin
Collegian Staff

State Representative Ellen Story discussed the changes in the University of Massachusetts affirmative action admissions practices at the first University Democrats general meeting since the organization's activation this semester.

"I think the University [administrators] are doing the best they can and don't have much choice," said Story.

Story supported her statement by saying that race will not be eliminated as a University criterium for admissions, but will be one among other categories considered.

"This is driven on a national level by the Supreme Court," Story said.

"I have no doubt that affirmative action has been absolutely worthwhile," she added.

While Story generally supports affirmative action, she believes that not much can be done to change the current policy.

"This is in the courts. It doesn't matter what we do about this," said Story.

Story further talked about her run for office and experience in the state legislature.

"I worked on lots of other people's campaigns, but it never occurred to me to run for office until there was an empty seat," said Story.

She described the issuing of offices, house seats, and aides in the state legislature as a function of political and personal connections to the Speaker of the State House of Representatives.

"It's all done on favoritism," said Story.

She expressed anger specifically at Speaker of the House Tom Finneran, calling him a "bully."

Story also discussed the relative anonymity of State Representatives.

"The vast majority of our constituents don't have a clue who we are," she said.

She also extended congratulations to the attending audience for reactivating the University Democrats.

"I think we can be a model for college groups all over the state," said Aaron Saunders, the president of University Democrats.

During the rest of the meeting, members voted to amend the constitution. A decision whether to charge members a $5 membership fee was delayed until a later time.

Anil Savani, the secretary of University Democrats, spoke about the initiation of the student organization.

"We were looking for a counterpart to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst Republican Club," said Savani.

The officers of University Democrats are looking to be active not only during elections, but also year-round.

"In order to get this procedure going we voted ourselves into office," said Savani.

He further noted that elections for officer positions will be open during later meetings for interested parties.

The University Democrats are also planning to host different speakers, as well as a softball game with the Republican Club this semester. Their next meeting will take place on March 25.

"formal written response... by Tuesday March 23, 1999 at 5 p.m." The letter is addressed to President Bulger, the Board of Trustees, and Chancellor David K. Scott.

The demands outlined in the letter are:

1. Declare a moratorium on the change in admission and financial aid practices, and;

2. Create an independent committee of students, faculty, staff, and lawyers who are genuinely representative of the University's diversity to negotiate, formulate, and draft a new admissions policy.

The letter went on to state: "The member of the committee shall be determined by a consensual agreement between the Taskforce for Equal Opportunity and Access and the University administration. The purpose of this independent committee is two-fold: it must enable the University to be responsive and responsible to the legality of admissions while improving the capacity of the University to be a truly equal opportunity institution."

After the letter was read protesters began chanting. "Don't Screw with Us."

Nelson Acosta, the director of the Asian, Latino/a, African, and Native American (ALANA) Affairs Office said he felt optimistic after yesterday's rally, considering the rally was "right before spring break and we had students out here in the cold shows that people are concerned. They want social justice, they don't want UMass to be like California and Texas."

Stokes also left the rally feeling positive. "I think it went excellent actually. We want a response as quickly as possible because it is the survival of ALANA at stake."

Resa Singleton, the coordinator of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), agreed.

"It went well and we expect a response," she said.

we used to do it," he said.

The florist said he doesn't expect a catastrophe but does hope for one small disruption Jan. 1, 2000.

"I wish my mortgage would disappear," he said.

One store owner is not losing sleep over Y2K, but is aware of some possible complications.

"Will my landlord be able to take my checks and use them or my suppliers?" said Helen Call, owner of Call Opticians who said she uses her computer for inventory and bookkeeping. "I don't have that much on the computer. I [made] backups. I'm very conscientious about doing backups."

But another establishment has already addressed the issue.

"It doesn't affect us. We just upgraded all of our equipment," said Greta Redzko, manager of the Amherst Copy Cat Print Shop.

One store in Amherst is sidestepping the issue all together.

"We don't have a computer. This is the old system. We walk around and see what [needs to be restocked]," said Nancy Cowen, assistant to the owner of I Used To Be A Tree. "Computers don't come from trees."

But for those businesses that do have to upgrade to be Y2K compliant, U.S. Senator John Kerry has proposed a bill to give loans to small businesses to upgrade and deal with Y2K problems.

The bill has been passed in the Senate and action is expected to be taken on it next week by the House of Representatives, said Kyle Sullivan, spokesperson for Kerry. Sullivan said the bill is expected to be passed by the House.

If passed, it would expand the 7(a) loan program that helps fund small business owners. Sullivan said business owners would be able to apply for as much money as they want, but the banks will be backed by the government for $750,000–$1 million.

The range is for business owners who already have a 7(a) loan so they can expand their loan past the typical $750,000 cut-off to pay for Y2K preparations and reparations.

However, Sullivan said average loans are expected to be around $100,000.

Kerry, who is the ranking member of the small business committee, proposed the bill with Senator and committee Chairperson, Christopher Bond (R–Mont.).

But the bill aimed at helping small businesses may be unnecessary help for some.

"They [the computers] don't care. They are dinosaurs. [Nothing could hurt them] except a comet," Herold said.

Baseball goes South

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

In an attempt to get it right, the Massachusetts baseball team is heading south for the second weekend in a row to face a menagerie of southern and northern teams over spring break.

Last week, the Minutemen dropped three to No. 22 North Carolina State Wolfpack, having already played 12 games, improved to 14–1 on the year. UMass pitching ace Bill Cooke was roughed-up in his first start, pitching four innings and allowing six earned runs. The offense also struggled, padding only two runs on the weekend.

"That's to be expected the first time out," coach Mike Stone said. "They're good hitters who have already played 18 intra-squad games on top of their regular season."

However, the Minutemen are looking forward to eight games in the more friendly climate of Florida. Maintaining their tradition with South Florida, they will begin a three- game series on Friday with the Bulls. Resting on Sunday, UMass is scheduled to have one game apiece with Canisius, Niagara and Central Connecticut, and two with Lafayette.

Today, UMass will open up against the Bulls, who stand at an even 8–8 record. South Florida has had mixed success this spring. While walloping some teams by a 13–1 margin, they have also dropped a pair to Mississippi St. to the tune of 2–18 both times. The Bulls showcase a well–balanced offense with Chris Cuccia batting .385 with six doubles and 12 RBI. South Florida has a potent pitching staff, highlighted by a strong southpaw in Scott Glaser, who has already logged 31.2 innings and struck out 24 batters.

On Tuesday, UMass will face Canisius, who have yet to play this year. Facing Lafayette on Wednesday and Friday, the Minutemen will be playing another team who hasn't competed this season.

Sandwiched between the two Lafayette games is Niagara. Having lost their only three games this year to Alabama, the Purple Eagles look to improve on a slow start. Collectively batting just .198, Niagara has produced two extra base hits and driven in four runs in three games. The Tide had a field–day with the Purple Eagles pitchers, who have amassed an ERA of 17.62.

Facing a more familiar opponent, Central Connecticut (2– 1), the Minutemen will look to avenge a 4–9 loss left over from last year.

Freshman righthander Brian Hourigan will get the nod today, followed by Travis Veracka and Bill Cooke on Sunday. Scott Anderson should make a more frequent appearance in the regular lineup after going 2–for–3 last weekend.

The Minutemen will return for their home opener against Providence on Tuesday, March 23 at 2:30 p.m.

Softball goes sunbathing

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

Spring break is finally here, and droves of students are heading south to the warm sunshine of Florida. Among them is the Massachusetts softball team. Unlike the others, though, their trip is all business.

Massachusetts (Currently ranked No. 22 in the nation by USA Today) is set to participate in the Florida State Invitational in Tallahassee this weekend.

This marks the third tournament that the 6–5 Minutewomen will compete in as the regular season home–opener draws closer. Two weekends ago the UMass team rallied from a slow start to capture the Bronze in the NFCA Leadoff Classic in Columbus, Georgia.

Slated to face the Maroon and White in Tallahassee are Marshall and Robert Morris today, and Georgia on Saturday, before the playoffs begin. These are the first meetings in UMass history between all three of these schools.

After the tournament concludes, the Minutewomen will lock up once against Western Illinois and twice against Florida State before returning home to Amherst. UMass looks to improve its all–time record against the Seminoles, who have owned them, taking nine games out of the 11 times the two teams have faced each other.

The Minutewomen's fortune will undoubtedly rest on pitcher and senior co–captain Danielle Henderson. Henderson (5–2) has captured all but one of the UMass victories this season. In her last two games, she allowed only three hits and struck out 27 batters to power the Maroon and White to two wins.

Losses to Michigan State and Oklahoma two weekends ago have dropped the Minutewomen from a No. 10 national rank to No. 22 in the country.

Yet these early setbacks are no cause for concern.

Last season, the Minutewomen began 3–12 before heating up in the regular season to finish 45–14 as Atlantic 10 Champions and College World Series participants.

This season, the Massachusetts squad is actually off to a much better start, especially considering that its early schedule has taken the team up against quality top–ranked opponents like Oklahoma, Alabama, Arizona State, Long Beach State, Arizona, Texas and Nebraska.

As most students relax and enjoy their spring break, the Minutewomen will be fighting to show the rest of the nation why they are nationally ranked.

twelve goals and two assists, realizes how important it is to prepare for every team equally.

"We take it game by game on this team," Negus said. "We are totally focused on Fairfield right now, and after that game, we will begin to think about Virginia some more."

Making the Stags match–up even more intriguing this year is the fact that they have raised their play to a higher level, posting a 3–0 mark thus far, including an upset win over Harvard.

Fairfield stunned the formidable Crimson 13–5 on March 6, to compliment triumphs over Quinnipiac and Marist, 15–2 and 14–8, respectively.

"I am not that surprised by the way Fairfield has been playing," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said. "Despite the score, they played us tough last season, and they have another year of experience so it will be a tough game."

UMass has won the only two previous meetings with the Stags, including last year's 13–4 romp at Garber, as UMass pulled away late in the contest.

One of the key factors in Fairfield's success thus far has been the outstanding play of junior attack Spencer Steele, who has racked up 17 points in the first three contests on 11 goals and six assists.

Sophomore midfielder Peter Shanley has complimented Steele nicely, with five goals and four assists, while Shaun Graham has been the sharpest shooter, firing in seven goals on only 12 attempts.

Stags keeper Brad Tarr has earned all three victories in net, allowing 14 goals while making 34 saves.

After tomorrow's contest, the Minutemen will prepare for No. 5 Virginia, a squad they have never beaten in their six previous encounters.

Most recently, the Cavaliers held off the Minutemen 16–10 in 1997.

Head coach Dom Starsia has enjoyed tremendous success during his six years at UVA, posting a 66–26 mark, including an 0–1 start to the 1999 campaign.

The Cavs fell at Syracuse 14–12 at the Carrier Dome last Saturday before UMass was defeated by Cornell in the same venue hours later.

Senior midfielder David Baruch starred for UVA on Saturday, recording five goals on five attempts.

Last year, Tucker Radebaugh led the team with 56 points on 30 goals and 26 assists.

UMass will look to feed off the efforts of sophomore goalie Chris Campolettano, who has had the hot hand in net thus far.

Campolettano has been an effective presence for the Minutemen since assuming the starting role, allowing only nine goals in the first two games.

"[Campolettano] has been very good so far," Cannella said.

"We need him to continue to play well and come up with the big saves. The competition amongst our goalies in the pre–season seems to have benefitted him greatly."

San Diego State, No.18 Pacific and No. 12 Long Beach State. The trip will conclude at No. 9 UC Santa Barbara on March 17.

A schedule filled with such worthy adversaries would seemingly intimidate such a young team (UMass counts no seniors among its roster). However, the Minutewomen view this trip as a necessary trial–by–fire in their quest for national recognition.

"A trip like this really helps us in our rankings by giving us better competition," said Michigan native Laurie Edwards, one of five juniors that the team looks to for leadership. "Instead of winning 17–2, we can face some tougher teams and play some really good games."

By playing so many established programs in so short a time, UMass will need to rely heavily on its conditioning and depth to spell success. Coach Dan McOsker has used the two meets leading up to the trip to test different combinations of players in the pool, and even he must be pleased with the wealth of contributors on this team.

"Our team is young, but we're close–knit and very deep," said Grogan. "When we've played teams without our depth, like Maryland, we've been able to exploit their key players and get them kicked out."

Although many of the state's notorious teams have slipped a little, the Minutewomen still expect some dogfights in California. West Coast water polo typically features a faster game with more counter–attack swimming. This means that UMass must play as a defensive paces UMass with 16 goals thus far. "I guess people are getting a clue or something."

Hupp agrees. "When we played Princeton last weekend, they took our whole set out of the game by dropping on us. By double–teaming our two–meter on offense, they made us go more to our outside shooters."

Luckily, field players like Edwards and junior Lyndsay Crenshaw have shone just as brightly from the outside, and the results have been UMass victories. And if you ask the Minutewomen, they expect to strike gold in California.

"These girls are at almost exactly the same level that we are," said Edwards. "As long as everybody on this team is ready for the challenge, we should come away with some "whole" to come out on top.

"Everything's got to click against these higher caliber teams," said junior two–meter Marci Hupp, a veteran of two West Coast swings. "In the front–and–lanes defense that we run, if somebody messes up, it leaves us vulnerable."

After such a fantastic start, the Minutewomen can also expect opposing teams to make adjustments to stop the high– scoring Maroon and White offensive attack. Already this year, teams have made switches to befuddle the likes of Grogan, Hupp, and fellow junior Claudia Clement.

"I've felt a lot more defensive pressure this year," said Grogan, who really bring wins."

Flint regroups, answers rumors

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

On the big–screen television in the lounge leading into the Massachusetts men's basketball offices on the third floor of the William D. Mullins Center, Syracuse and Oklahoma State were playing hoops.

On the leather couch facing the set was UMass coach Bruiser Flint, finishing the slice of pizza that was his lunch for the day.

"This is the first I've really seen of the [NCAA] tournament, to be honest," Flint said, gazing at the first–round matchup on the television. "I haven't had a chance to look at the brackets or anything. I've been out recruiting so much lately."

It is the first time in eight years that the University of Massachusetts is not represented amongst the elite group of 64 teams selected to fight for the national championship. UMass ended the year with a disappointing 14–16 record after being picked by Sports Illustrated and Athlon magazines as a preseason Top 10 team.

Once the season ended for the Minutemen, with a 72–68 loss to Xavier last Thursday in the Atlantic 10 tournament, Flint wasted no time taking steps to ensure that next year he wouldn't be just watching the tournament.

The UMass skipper has spent much of the past week speaking to high school coaches and players to try to convince them to take the court for the Maroon and White when the time comes for them to enroll in college.

"We've got two scholarships [to give]," Flint said. "We've been recruiting [potential players] all along, really. We've just got to get them on campus."

Flint will be working with much of the same lineup in the 1999–2000 season as he did for the '98–'99 one, as the team retains three starters and nearly the entire bench.

Between glances at the Syracuse–Oklahoma St matchup, the coach grimaced at the mention of several rumors around campus that the team would look dramatically different next year.

University hearsay is that UMass might be welcoming a transfer from North Carolina State, while also losing forward Ronnell Blizzard and guard Jonathan DePina to the same medium.

"That's just Internet chatboard stuff," Flint said of the NC State player. "That's not really a story."

As for Blizzard and DePina, he said, "[They're not transferring] from what they tell me. I told them that there are no guarantees [for playing time] here. If they want to leave, then that's their decision. I'm definitely not pushing them out the door."

When the third–year coach thinks ahead to next year's lineup, he sees the biggest hole in the paint, where senior Lari Ketner stood during the course of the last three seasons. Flint foresees that the trio of Kitwana Rhymer, Anthony Oates and incoming freshman Micah Brand will step into the void.

"We need someone as an inside presence," Flint claimed, stating later, "Kit is a better rebounder than Lari was. Offensively is where he needs to learn."

In the backcourt, Flint is looking forward to seeing Shannon Crooks play, a transfer from St. John's who will be eligible to compete next season.

Flint left the television on as he got up to return to his rigorous off–season workload. Next year there might not be anyone in the office to turn it on in the first place.

No Idiots Allowed!

Brian Lohnes

This simple phrase brings back memories of club houses, cooties, and a time when guys found toads cooler than girls. As much as I love toads now, girls definitely took their place somewhere along the line. The funny thing is, toads and guys have a lot in common. Toads are slimy and girls often find them gross and disgusting. Strangely enough, many times guys do things that elicit those same responses. I am sure that most girls do not find arm-pit farting, sustained belching, and conversations about bodily functions at all attractive... at least, most of them don't.

Another thing that women don't like is idiocy. We guys like to do things that seem utterly destructive to relationships with members of the opposite sex. I, for example, have been with my girlfriend for two and a half years, and during that time I have done some really stupid stuff that has jeopardized our relationship.

A major faux-pas for me is forgetting things as soon as they are said to me. I forget things like dates, times, where the car is parked and occasionally clothing. Maybe my memory is about as good as a really, really old lobotomy patient's, but that's not my fault. It is my fault that I never write anything down, and that I don't have a small man who lives in my pocket and reminds me of things.

> "Maybe my memory is about as good as a really, really, old lobotomy patient's, but that's not my fault."

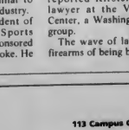
As an idiot, I seem to have a knack for making people really mad unintentionally. I was not out to offend anyone or put anyone down when I criticized Barbie. I was not criticizing what she stood for, I was poking fun at the actual physical being of the doll. I do understand that women have far more social pressures on them than men. Also, I think that if we can't laugh at anything anymore, we will be screwed. I have a heap-load of respect for women and I don't envy you girls at all.

Even an idiot still has some degree of brain function so I am not going to go into any depth about affirmative action. I will admit that I am not crystal clear on what is going on, but from what I can gather, a lot of people are getting screwed big time. To me this seems unacceptable and I know that the Republican Club guys are probably throwing some all-night bashes over this one. Do we have an obligation to help people? Why was this program that seemed to be running smoothly yanked away? These are questions that no good answers have been given to so far.

Let's not forget that Chancellor Scott and our esteemed president Mr. William "Crook" Bulger are both getting raises that are "bigger than some small countries' yearly budgets. I can't help but wonder if the deletion of affirmative action is a smoke screen. I am no Oliver Stone here, but it has to make you think.

I would really love to spout off about this but I need to get my facts straightened out first. I have seen what both sides have to say, but I need to sort through all that and come up with the real hard truth. This is where idiots again enter the conversation. Chancellor Scott had to have known what was going to happen when he announced this. He had to have figured on the rallies and protests. And the kicker of it all was that he delivered the message via e-mail, the most bland thing possible.



He should have taken out a full page ad in the Collegian and explained what was going to happen. It should have also included directions to his house, a coupon for five free minutes behind a microphone of some kind, and a free meal at the D.C. to "carbo-load" for the protests and marches that followed.

From an idiot's perspective... I love this place. There is action, adventure and controversy here every day. I have the best girlfriend in the world here (I hope I don't pass the idiot gene to our kids) and a group of friends who love to discuss current events, have heated conversations, and actually still enjoy arm-pit farting.

Trigger happy?

Emily Vacanti

Are you trigger-happy? Do you know anyone who is? They may have to change due to the introduction of legislation requiring the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms (ATF) to regulate guns for the first time ever. Up until now, a toy gun has been subject to more regulations than a handgun that kills.

If this legislation goes through, minimum safety standards will be set. This means that the ATF could recall a defective gun model. Warning labels would also be used.

One reason that this legislation is being pushed so hard and is so important, according to a March 2 Boston Globe article, is because "it parallels the tobacco industry's fight to simultaneously fend off legal action in court and a congressional push to regulate its products."

It has rejected attempts at imposing consumer and safety regulations on itself, which is very similar to the actions of the tobacco industry.

Richard Feldman, president of the American Shooting Sports Council, took this bill, cosponsored by Patrick J. Kennedy, as a joke. He believes that the gun industry is already very heavily regulated, and that any more regulation would mean testing to see whether children can bite the trigger off of a gun and ingest it.

Feldman also pointed out that "lawsuits don't stem from the production of faulty products as much as from a gun's misuse." He says that suing of the gun industry generally occurs because the gun does what it should; the problem is where the gun is pointed. In the end, someone or something gets hurt.

> "Suing of the gun industry generally occurs because the gun does what it should."

Another reason that this bill is heavily supported, said the Globe article, is that "one-third of gun accidents that kill children could have been prevented by requiring trigger locks and safety regulations."

"Firearms kill more Americans every year than all household and recreational products combined," reported Kirsten Rand, senior lawyer at the Violence Policy Center, a Washington gun-control group.

The wave of lawsuits accusing firearms of being both a public nuisance and a health hazard, is due to the absence of regulations. With more regulations, safety will be taken very seriously. Many hope that in the future one will have to take classes on gun control and safety before they are allowed to bring the weapon home. And when I say classes, I mean more than one or two. Just enough so that gun advocates know what they are getting themselves into by possessing a deadly weapon.

If this bill doesn't go through, gun-control supporters hope that it will eventually figure into settlement discussions with the industry. Even if it fails in Congress, there has to be another way to gain control of an industry with so much power that kills.

"It is essential for Congress to push for concessions from the gun industry," the Globe reporter wrote. The majority of the gun industry is taking this very seriously, beginning preliminary discussions with some of the many plaintiffs in the lawsuits.

The introduction of this bill is the first step toward ending the gun industry's ability to dodge regulation. It will provide a benchmark for real regulation. This benchmark will help make sure that the gun industry is not let off the hook until it agrees to be regulated.

Letters to the Editor

Let's get back to reality!

To the Editor:

Yes! Elvis is back and going on tour. Finally he admitted that he's just been hiding for the last few years! OK, I admit it, I'm living in a fantasy world and I got jealous. I got jealous because it seems as though many writers for the Collegian seem to live a life of fantasy. In their world, affirmative action is appropriate because all minorities live in ghettos and all white people live in Amherst.

Look through your old Brockton yearbooks, kids... about half of the students were white. I wonder where Paul Martinez actually went to school. He wrote about "all that stuff [like] the poor quality of inner-city schools" being detrimental to minorities. Have you ever even driven by an inner-city school, Pauly? There are white people there, too!

It disgusts me when I read articles written by Rene Gonzalez, a graduate of Amherst schools, who doesn't understand why a race-based (as opposed to area-based) admission policy is unjust. Rene's most recent ignorant statement was "affirmative action does not bump qualified white students out for non-qualified minorities." What do you think it does?

Any of the white students in Brockton who, while working after (or during) school, manage to get a good GPA or SAT score can be bumped if you want to enter the University even if you have lower scores than they do. If your rationale is to raise people of your own race's social status, then why would you have chosen a major known for not finding jobs, Paul?

Unfortunately, since I'm busy working so that my kids might be able to grow up in an area as nice as Rene's, all I have is what I've seen personally and not from biased surveys. For that I apologize to every white person who doesn't fit into your prejudiced, racist stereotype because I'm sure that race-based admissions will once again be adopted after morons living in their fantasy world handcuff themselves to Goodell.

Homophobia at UMass

Colleen Burke-Pitts

On Friday, March 5, my roommate and I anxiously packed up the car and left to go home for the weekend. The following Sunday, we returned to find that someone had scrawled "patch lickas here" directly above our door with a blue marker.

I spent my first semester here living on the 2 in 20 Floor for Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender Students and their Heterosexual Allies, a special-interest living program in Mary Lyon Residence Hall. It was comforting knowing I could be myself and not have to worry about how my neighbors would react.

My roommate transferred to UMass this semester from a liberal college in Cape Cod, anticipating the diversity of UMass to enrich her experience. We both moved to Brett Residence Hall because of the nine-month living option and because we had believed that Central was an accepting living area for a diverse mix of students.

This past month, Brett House has been repeatedly written up in the Police Log of the Collegian for "annoying behavior." On February 13, homophobic graffiti was written on a dry-erase board. Another time, a poster was defaced with a swastika and homophobic graffiti. A swastika was actually found carved in a bathroom stall.

> The words written above our door could not be classified as a hate crime because they were not considered to be directly threatening.

My roommate promptly reported the graffiti written above our door to the cluster office and was told it was proper procedure to report such incidents to the UMass Police Department. A police officer arrived about two hours later to take a formal report of what had happened.

The officer explained to my roommate, my Resident Assistant, and me that the words written above our door could not be classified as a hate crime because they were not considered to be directly threatening. If the person had written something about threatening our lives, that would be one thing, but this type of statement was to be classified as "annoying behavior."

Needless to say, I found the statement to be personally threatening and far exceeding the realm of annoyance. I would like to consider Brett House to be my home, but coming back to my room to discover hateful messages is not what I consider to be a welcoming environment.

Quartet plays quirky set

By Imogen Lillywhite
Collegian Correspondent

An aspect of jazz that is loved by many and loathed by a fastidious few is its freedom. The impromptu, improvisational unfetteredness is, I'm sure, what attracts people to this deceptively complex music. Who but jazz musicians can spin out a one movement, monothematic piece into a 25-minute performance?

This is precisely what the Adam Kolker Quintet did at Wednesday night's performance at the University of Massachusetts' Bezanson Hall.

The faculty jazz recital, funded in part by the UMass Arts Council, featured Adam Kolker, saxophone; Kevin Hays, piano; Dan Weiss, bass; and Tom Rainey, drums. They were later joined by Jeff Holmes on trumpet, who is more often seen conducting the University Big Band.

The first piece "I Should Care," by Sammy Connan, opened with a musky, atmospheric sax solo by Kolker which set the tone of the recital. This was followed by one of Kolker's own thoughtful compositions entitled "Ode to Joe," and a mournful George Gershwin number, which made use of dialogues between the saxophone and piano.

The mood then shifted to concentrate on composer Thelonius Monk. The fourth number took the traditional jazz form of solos for each player. Tom Rainey's drum solo was easily the most smoothly-controlled I have ever seen in a live concert. Drums are so often passed off as mundane rhythm section instruments that when they break into the solo mold, the effect is much more dramatic. In fact, the range of dynamics and sounds, not to mention the strong rhythmic force that can be achieved with a drum solo, is often far more commanding than any other instrument.

Jeff Holmes joined for the final two numbers and had carefully-crafted trumpet and saxophone conversations with Kolker. The final number made use of difficult cross rhythms and hemiola "at would strike fear into the heart of any musicologist. All in all, this was a very relaxing and enjoyable show which was unstructured and improvised in the spirit of jazz. The dedication, preparation and talent behind this performance was obvious from the second it began.

The next event in this series will be "Music in Response to the Holocaust" at Bezanson on March 23 at 8 p.m.

Noise to determine winners?

By Michael Fleeman
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Among all the sound and fury of the war and action movies nominated for the Academy Awards' best achievement in sound is this unlikely candidate: Shakespeare in Love.

The costume drama does have some clippity-clop of horse hoofs and a clanging exchange of blades in a brief sword fight, but mostly it's a lot of talking. And that, says sound man Robin O'Donoghue, is what made the project so challenging.

"The tricky scenes are when you have a quiet scene between two actors in the room and maintain the life of the city in the background," said O'Donoghue.

"The little sounds — the little ticking clocks, the distant church bell — they take a lot more thought and consideration of how they're played and positioned."

Shakespeare in Love faces tough competition from films lauded for their groundbreaking use of sound, from the terrifying battle noises in Saving Private Ryan to the surreal swooshing of the undulating grasses in The Thin Red Line.

But even for those noisier pictures, it may be the subtle use of sound that determines the winner.

In one of the more confusing Oscar races, sound is broken down into two categories; three films compete for best achievement in sound effects editing, and five for best achievement in sound — the blending of effects with dialogue and music. Often, there is overlap among the nominees.

This year the sound effects nominees are Armageddon, The Mask of Zorro and Saving Private Ryan, while sound achievement nominees are Armageddon, Zorro, Saving Private Ryan, Shakespeare in Love and The Thin Red Line. Awards will be given out in Los Angeles March 21.

The art of sound is to use the noises, dialogue and music to move the story forward, bring characters to life and create emotions. Even a war picture can't survive entirely on big explosions.

In the World War II epic The Thin Red Line, great attention was focused on the gentler, quieter scenes between the booming battles, according to re-recording mixer Anna Behmer, nominated in the sound achievement category.

Terrence Malick, the idiosyncratic director, had a unique ear for war, she said. "Terry made it pretty clear in a lot of areas he wanted the film to seem meditative."

She recalled him telling her: "Make it oceanic. Make it flow from one scene to the next without any harsh scene changes that will jolt the audience. When I get them in a zone I want to keep them there, almost like a stream of consciousness."

"It was different," said Behmer. "After a while, you kind of got it. It was a question of getting it. It was a question of getting into Terry's thinking and Terry's mode. Then, it made perfect sense."

In the other World War II movie, "Saving Private Ryan," sound design and re-recording mixer Gary Rydstrom said the goal was to present battle through the ears of the soldier on the ground and, in some brief scenes, under the ocean water, with close attention to authenticity.

"One of my jobs was to make a library of World War II sounds that would resonate with the men who heard them," said Rydstrom, nominated in both categories. "It was so specific: the ping of an empty cartridge after an M1 shoots, the sound of a German tank having a squeal and an American tank being smoother."

Another challenge was to create a sound effects symphony for the much-lauded opening scene of 25 minutes of carnage on the beach at Normandy — full of noise, but no musical score.

"We had to take control of it. We had to make it seem both chaotic, like a real battle, but particular, so that every bullet impact was seared into your memory," he said.

Among the ways the sound technicians for Saving Private Ryan tried to make the sounds more memorable were through the use of ricochet noises and other startling and unpredictable sounds.

"The most terrifying sounds are those things that you can't tell where they're coming from," said Rydstrom. "That's what scares you."

Attention to detail in the movie sound business has reached the point where a sword fight is more than just clashing steel.

A single sword effect in The Mask of Zorro was actually the result of eight to 12 different effects, from the whoosh of the saber through the clanking metal to the after-ring, said supervising sound editor David McMoyler, nominated in the effects category.

As the movie progresses, and the hero, played by Antonio Banderas, becomes more adept at fighting, his sword sounds changes. The strikes go from "really flat sounds" to having "more timbre, a lot more ring," said McMoyler.

"It's not as simple as finding the appropriate sound to match the vision," said McMoyler.

"For every sound I put in there, I wanted to tell the story, to flesh out the character, not just to make it sound cool. And if it sounds cool, that's great. And when they all work together, that's a cherry on top."

Will Gumbel return to morning TV?

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Two years ago this week, CBS won an intense three-network bidding war for the services of former "Today" host Bryant Gumbel by agreeing to pay him nearly $5 million a year. Now he's virtually an invisible man.

His newsmagazine canceled, Gumbel hasn't appeared on the air for CBS since he was host of a news special in December. It's not clear when he'll appear on-screen again. CBS says it is discussing future projects with Gumbel, but won't disclose more.

To some at the network, the comeback path appears clear: a return to morning television as host of CBS's perpetually struggling "This Morning," where Gumbel would compete against the morning institution where he reigned for 15 years.

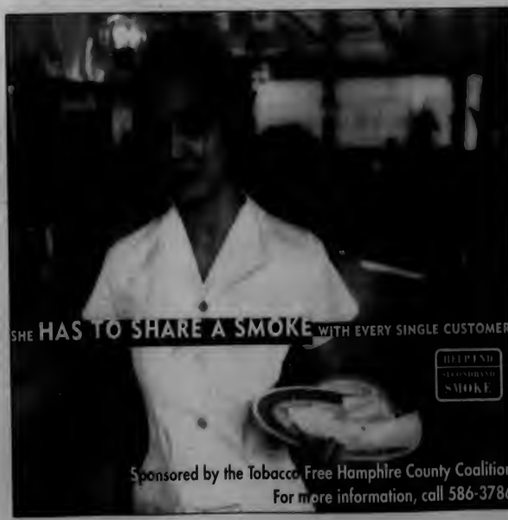
Gumbel's agent, Ed Hookstratten, said CBS officials have talked with Gumbel about being host of the morning show, but the idea is a long way from reality. Gumbel sent word through a spokeswoman that he didn't want to talk publicly about the possibility.

"He enjoyed his 15 years on 'Today,'" Hookstratten said. "He's been away from it for a few years. He may be amenable to it, I don't know. But it hasn't gotten to the point of 'Hey, Bryant, will you do it?'"

Bringing Gumbel to "This Morning" would allow CBS to take a serious run at ABC's "Good Morning America" for second place in morning TV, an increasingly lucrative time of day for networks. "Today" is so far ahead that it's not a realistic target at this point.

"This Morning" very briefly surged past "Good Morning America" in the ratings at the end of last year, but has settled back into third place since Diane Sawyer and Charles Gibson were installed as hosts of the ABC show.

CBS is talking about a range of changes to "This Morning," now anchored by Mark McEwen and Jane Robelot. CBS News President Andrew Heyward said, "We are pleased with its progress but are not satisfied," he said.



"Bryant and I are colleagues and friends and we talk all the time," Heyward said. "Of course, the morning show is part of this. But there have been no offers, no negotiations, no demands. All of this is a work in progress."

"Good Morning America" may actually pave the way for Gumbel's return. Luring Sawyer and Gibson to be hosts established the precedent of news stars returning to morning television, making it easier for CBS to approach Gumbel about this job. Sawyer worked for CBS's morning show in the early 1980s.

Hockey chases conference title

UMass loses game one to Maine

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

ORONO, Maine — On a night where it seemed like nothing went its way, the Massachusetts hockey team dropped game one of the Hockey East quarterfinals to the University of Maine by a 3–1 score last night at Alfond Arena.

With the victory, the Black Bears take a 1–0 lead in the best–of–three series, while the Minutemen are now one loss away from concluding their season. Game two will be tonight at 7 p.m. in Orono.

"I thought we played a great road game. We allowed too many shots, but to be down 2–1 to the No. 4 team in the country, we were good up to that point," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "We gave up a lot of shots, but we also had a lot of quality chances [offensively]."

Leading 2–1 heading into the final 20 minutes, Maine picked up an insurance goal at the 3:32 mark of the third period on a wrist–shot by Cory Larose. Senior co–captain Steve Kariya set up the whole play by carrying the puck through the neutral zone and warding off two UMass defenders before firing a blind, off–balance pass to Larose in the high slot.

The Minutemen had a chance to knot the game at 2–2 late in the second period. With Massachusetts' Nathan Sell in the penalty box for an interference call, junior alternate captain Jeff Blanchard walked in alone on Maine goaltender Alfie Michaud. However, the Black Bears' senior net–minder denied Blanchard with a pad–stacking save to keep Maine in front.

"The big play of the game was when Alfie made that save on Blanchard. That was a huge play," Maine Coach Shawn Walsh said. "We were struggling with our play, because our defense was carrying the puck too much and that was getting us into trouble."

The Black Bears took a 1–0 lead at 5:23 of the opening period on a goal by Dan Kerluke. The sophomore winger controlled a UMass clearing attempt before releasing a slap– shot from the left face–off circle that went over the right shoulder of Minuteman goaltender Markus Helanen.

Maine then increased its lead to two goals only 0:37 into the middle frame. UMass captain Dean Stork got caught pinching in from the point on a power play, and the Black Bears broke out on a two–on–one rush the other way. Senior Bobby Stewart never let go of the puck, though, slipping a shot through the legs of Helanen for a 2–0 advantage.

Blanchard answered Stewart's goal with one of his own less than a minute later to cut the Maine lead in half. The Stouffville, Ontario product beat Michaud with a slap–shot from the right face–off circle to trim the Black Bears' lead to only a goal, 2–1.

The game stayed that way until Larose put the issue to rest early in the third period.

Despite allowing three goals, Helanen was spectacular between the pipes for the Minutemen, making 40 saves in the losing effort.

"Markus gave us a great effort. He's one of the best goalies in our league and we've got to find a way to get three goals or more for him," Mallen said.

According to Walsh: "This was a good playoff win to get, especially when you run into a hot goalie [like Helanen]... You have to give him a lot of credit. He played outstanding."

The Minutemen now need to win tonight to force a game three tomorrow night and extend their season for at least one more day. Another Maine win tonight, however, will close the books on UMass' campaign and send the Black Bears to the Hockey East semifinals.

Helanen dominates in net, can't overcome poor offensive showing; Black Bears only need three on the scoreboard to down Minutemen

By Paul Teves

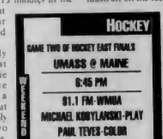
ORONO, Maine — When your goaltender comes up with a 40–save effort, and you still fall 3–1, there's a serious problem on offense.

The Massachusetts hockey team fell victim to the Maine Black Bears 3–1 in the first game of the Hockey East quarterfinal round held in Orono, Maine last night.



Markus Helanen, other than making 40 saves, was also the only Minuteman to earn a star of the game. Helanen not only put up the numbers, but he did it in style, making several saves that were of the extraordinary variety. This included saves on some of Maine's best offensive weapons, such as Steve Kariya, Cory Larose, Peter Metcalf and Ed Wood.

"It was a big playoff win to get, but when you run into a hot goalie like that, you've got to keep your team defensive– minded. I think in the second period we tried to force things offensively, but what we did was open up ourselves," Maine Coach Shawn Walsh said. "We played a great third period, we kept it simple, but I give them a lot of credit, and I give their goalie a lot of credit. He played outstanding."

The Minuteman offense, on the other hand, played a sub– par game, collecting one goal on 21 shots — of which, only two came in the third period.

UMass also went 13 minutes in the third frame without testing Black Bear goalie Alfie Michaud once.

Helanen certainly did his part last evening to help the Minutemen leave Alfond Arena with a 1–0 series lead, but his offense could only come up with two good opportunities. Junior Jeff Blanchard scored on the first one 1:36 into the second period, but Blanchard, who also found himself on a breakaway late in the period, couldn't finish off on the second.

"I think the big play in the game was the save that Alfie made on Blanchard late in the second," Walsh said. "That was a huge play, because we were struggling with our play and our defense was carrying the puck too much and that was killing us."

Helanen's stellar performance was nothing new to Maine. After all, the sophomore net–minder made a combined 87 saves in a two–game weekend series between the two in Amherst back in November. On that weekend, Helanen's effort was good enough to give the Minutemen a win and a tie against the Black Bears, but this time the offense let him down.

"I think we've got to generate more offense than that," UMass Coach Joe Mallen said. "The guys were just not moving quick enough into the open spaces, but [Helanen] gave us a solid effort, and he's one of the best goalies in Hockey East. We've got to find a way to get three goals or better, that's the key right now. We did a good job holding them to three goals, and we did a good job holding them to no goals on their power play. We've just got to be able to put the puck in the net."

When Coach Mallen was asked whether or not he would insert the team's fifth leading scorer, Ray Geever, into tonight's lineup to try to give the Minutemen an offensive spark, he said, "That's a possibility." Geever has been out with a shoulder injury since Feb. 12.

The Minutemen will likely go with Helanen again tonight, but this time their backs are against the wall. Down one game to none in the best two–of–three series, the Minutemen offense, which was non–existent last night, will have to find a way to provide their goalkeeper with some breathing room.

UM looking to dominate in '99

The women's lacrosse team looks to prosper in the 1999 season as it returns players like (from l to r) Denise Brey, Melissa Anderson, Jen Nardi, and Colleen Wales.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

It's all coming together now.

A year ago, Massachusetts women's lacrosse coach Francesca McClellan began the season by creating for her players a simple goal.

"Last year, the theme was 'learning how to win games'," McClellan said. "It's an attitude — a real mental attitude. This year, we're focusing on putting teams away."

In 1997, the coach, who came to UMass in 1994 to resurrect a program that had fallen from a national championship in '82 to complete disbandment in '91, guided the Minutewomen to a 6–7 record — the team's most wins in eight years.

Still, though, the squad was widely overlooked in the world of collegiate lacrosse. McClellan, responsible for coaching Yale from a 4–10 mark to a Top 10 national ranking in the early 1990s, then set the aforementioned goal to get the Minutewomen over the proverbial hump.

The result: a 9–6 record and an appearance in the semifinal round of the ECAC tournament. The Maroon and White learned how to win, gaining victories in four games that were decided by two goals or less under McClellan.

This year, UMass is looking for some separation.

"We typically start off slow," McClellan said. "That was typical of the Penn State game last year (which UM lost, 14– 13 in the ECAC's). This year, we need to play 60 minutes and not just 40 or 50."

The coach will have plenty to work with when attempting to put space between her team and the competition. The Minutewomen's first chance to distance themselves comes tomorrow in a game originally scheduled at Harvard University at 1 p.m.

The Minutewomen, who entered the season ranked No. 20 in the nation, graduated only three seniors. Returning will be four of UMass' top five scorers, including Laura Korutz, who has recorded 41 points in each of the last two years, and Melissa Anderson, 1998 team MVP and Northeastern All–American. Helping put the ball past the goalkeeper will be juniors Stephanie Pavlick and Noelle Gorski, both of whom exploded onto the scene during their sophomore campaigns.

However, McClellan believes the Minutewomen still have some aces up their sleeve on offense.

"Rachel [Ingraffea] is quicker than all get–out," the coach said. "Teams will be decisive. Teams will mark Pavlick, they'll mark Korutz, and they'll mark [sophomore attack Fay] Naber, but they might not pay much attention to Ingraffeo. She's as deadly as Pavlick is."

The Minutewomen will also enjoy the reappearance of attack Katie Carey, who, after playing in 13 games as a freshman in 1997, was forced to sit out last year with a torn anterior cruciate ligament.

Also looked to for a scoring punch will be junior midfielder Rebecca Minaker, whom McClellan refers to as her "glue player" because of her cohesiveness with the unit. Minaker overcame a slow start in '98 to finish the season as a serious offensive threat.

Defensively, the team is stronger than ever, as the group, led by two–time Northeastern All–American defender Lynne Young, returns nearly every component of a cast that held opponents to only 8.93 goals a game last year — good for 14th in the country.

Harvard, as well as Wednesday's competition, Boston University, will have to contend with the likes of six returning Minutewomen who are each within a few inches of being 6–feet–tall, including sophomore Denise Brey and junior Jessica Passanese.

In the net will be either of two highly–touted sophomores. McClellan expects that the duo of Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi, who solidified the defense by platoon last spring, will become even more solid this coming season.

"I don't anticipate as much of a rollercoaster ride [as their was last year at the goaltender position]," McClellan said. "Both goalies have become more consistent."

Adding spice to the 1999 season will be the newly formed Atlantic 10 women's lacrosse conference, the championship trophy of which serving as a proverbial carrot for the stacked Minutewomen.

Water polo set to tear up West Coast on yearly trip

By Adam White

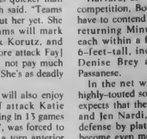
In the words of the immortal Jon Bon Jovi, "It's all the same, only the names have changed..."

The Massachusetts women's water polo team, after rattling off seven straight wins to open the '99 season, gets set this week for its annual West–Coast road trip. As the No. 6 Minutewomen prepare to do battle with six ranked teams in five days, it is hard to overlook the eerie resemblances between this year's campaign so far and last year's.

The '98 squad also went undefeated (6–0) prior to its West Coast swing, then dropped three of its first five games against tougher California teams. Sound defeats at the hands of then No.1 UCLA and No.6 USC gave the Minutewomen a fresh perspective of just how they stacked up in the national water polo picture. But according to the stars of the '99 team, this season will be an entirely different story.

"This is a relatively down year on the West Coast," said junior All–American Katie Grogan, named "Athlete of the Week" by WHMP Radio on Wednesday. "A lot of the key players out there are red–shirting, training for the Olympics."



This trend is reflected in the national rankings, as perennial powerhouse UCLA currently ranks fourth. UMass is slated to battle the Bruins on March 16 after tough contests at No. 11 UC San Diego, No. 5

Tough break for men's lax

While the core population of college students will be basking in the glory of spring break, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will be hard at work beginning tomorrow at 2 p.m., when they host Fairfield at Garber Field (WMUA 91.1 FM).

The laxmen will then return to practice this week, before making the trip down south to take on perennially–tough Virginia on March 20 at 1 p.m.

The Minutemen (1–1) are coming off a tough 5–4 loss to Cornell, and despite the season being as young as the general make–up of their team, the senior leaders know the time to win is now.

"The key for us is to keep playing hard and make sure we don't get ourselves in a rut," Minuteman Justin Koenigsberger said. "We want to establish momentum heading into the toughest part of our schedule."

Student's body found in canal

By Matthew Krowchun
Collegian Correspondent

Missing University of Massachussetts student Jose Figueroa's body was found in Turners Falls last Thursday. A joint effort of state police divers, the Northfield dive team, the South Hadley dive team and the Montague Police Department found the body while searching a two–mile section of Power Canal in northeast Turners Falls.

Figueroa, who was originally from Everett, was last seen leaving a friend's L Street apartment around 3:30 a.m. on Jan. 29 to go for a walk. According to police, he left without his jacket and backpack. He never returned to the apartment or to Brett Residence Hall where he lived. His credit cards were never used after that night.

Medical Examiner Loren Mednick determined that the cause of death was asphyxiation through drowning, and police say he drowned shortly after leaving the apartment. Assistant District Attorney David Angier said there were no signs of criminal activity regarding the drowning and no further investigation is planned.

Javier Cevallos, interim vice chancellor for student affairs at the University of Massachusetts Amherst released a statement Friday evening concerning Figueroa's death.

"We are deeply saddened to have our worst fears confirmed in Jose's death. We extend our deepest sympathy to his family and all who knew him," Cevallos wrote.

Police had been searching the area extensively since the disappearance of Figueroa, a senior who majored in finance and operations management. Mounted State police, K–9 units, and a helicopter crew were involved in the operation. During these searches the police found what they believed was Figueroa's sweatshirt near the Gill–Montague bridge.

Since the discovery of the sweatshirt the police had been planning to search the canal but had to wait for the conditions to be right. Northeast Utilities, which uses the canal to generate hydroelectric power, helped the police by lowering the water level in the canal. The Turners Falls fire department also aided in the search.

No funeral arrangements were available at time of print.

Chaplains and counselors are available for support for all members of the campus community; Mental Health can be reached at 545–2337, and the Dean of Students Office at 545–2684.

Shooting trial begins today

Chhim awaits court proceedings

By Stacey Shackford

The trial of Sokha Chhim, the 17–year–old Amherst resident being charged with attempted murder in the shooting of University of Massachusetts student Russell Bishop last semester, begins today in Hampshire County Superior Court in Northampton.

Bishop, the 25–year–old victim of the shooting who has since withdrawn from the University, is scheduled to be the state's first witness.

Chhim was arrested in Springfield on the morning of Nov. 18 and was charged with assault with intent to murder, assault and battery by means of a dangerous weapon, armed robbery, assault by means of a dangerous weapon and unlawfully carrying firearms.

A Jan. 8 grand jury trial found that "there is probable cause, based upon the identification of the defendant by three witnesses viewing photographic arrays," to believe that Chhim shot Bishop.

Identification will most likely be an important factor in the week–long trial. In an interview following a Feb. 9 status hearing, Chhim's court–appointed attorney Timothy Watkins said that identification testimonies collected from witnesses shortly after the shooting are not reliable.

"I think there is evidence that they identified the wrong person," Watkins said.

Watkins will not be defending Chhim in today's trial, however, he withdrew from the case last Tuesday, and Chhim hired Joseph A. Franco from Springfield to represent him.

According to a March 17 article in the Daily Hampshire Gazette, Franco said the decision reflected "no displeasure with Mr. Watkins," but he declined to comment further. Franco also told Hampshire Superior Court judge Judd Carhart on Tuesday that Chhim has an alibi.

Chhim has been held without bail in the Northampton House of

The green ribbons flutter in the strong wind outside of the W.E.B. Dubois Library.

By Jason Trenkle

Twenty years ago, a fence was put up around the unstable structure of the W.E.B. DuBois Library, and now students and faculty alike want to take a whack at the distorted fence to help rebuild its image through a project known as "Beautification a la Sledgehammer."

Arnette Nelson, Secretary Treasurer for Friends of the Library, feels there has been a need to improve the fencing for a long time, but adequate funding was unavailable.

"It [the fence] has been around the library because of the sprawling bricks," Nelson said. "There needs to be a fence so passers–by are protected."

Library Director Margo Crist agreed with Nelson on the need of a fence, but asked if they needed to have such an ugly one.

"The fence is an eyesore and a lot of people would like to see it changed," Nelson said. "This is an opportunity to make it into something beautiful at the center of campus."

Working in cooperation with the Physical Plant and Jim Cahill, Director of Facilities Planning, the Friends of the Library have projected to raise $75,000 towards the beautification of the fence by April 1, 1999.

The construction of the new fencing, set to be accomplished by Sept. 1, 1999, involves

Afghan women in strife; UMass group holds walk

By Joanna Mann
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Feminist Majority Leadership Alliance will sponsor a walk on Saturday, March 27 to promote awareness of gender apartheid in Afghanistan and raise funds for Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

Originally supported by the U.S. and Pakistani governments and welcomed by oil companies, the Taliban took over Afghanistan in 1996. Since then women have been living under a kind of "house arrest."

"If we consider sex to be as dangerous as a loaded Kalashnikov rifle, it is because it is the source of all immorality," said Alhaj Maulavi Qalamuddin, head of the Afghan government's Department for the Preservation of Virtue and Prevention of Vice.

The constancy of war and poverty has left Afghanistan with estimations of more than 30,000 widows in Kabul and elsewhere.

Under the Taliban regime Afghanistan women are prohibited from working and providing for their families. The code of law being enforced is a fundamentalist interpretation of Islamic Law (Shari'a) which empowers men to flog, torture, murder and rape women found violating the law. Women must wear a burqa, covering their entire bodies, with a 3–inch square of mesh covering the mouth and eyes.

Last year a European solidarity campaign for Afghan women, brought a public outcry on March 8, International Women's Day. Two days later the U.S. Department of State issued a fact sheet stating some of the Taliban's atrocities towards women, including shootings, denial of health care to women and an edict requiring that windows

University of Massachusetts student Kathryn Caserta has been cited for vehicular homicide by negligent operation and failure to yield to a pedestrian in a crosswalk in connection with the March 3 accident that resulted in the death of student Allison Lustig.

Caserta, 21, of Waldwick, N.J., was the operator of the vehicle that struck Lustig as she crossed Commonwealth Avenue near the intersection of Governors Drive at approximately 5 p.m. on March 3.

Lustig, 19, of Shrewsbury, was taken immediately to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield where she was treated for head injuries and remained in critical condition until her death on March 11.

The accident was investigated by the UMass Police Department and the Massachusetts State Police accident reconstruction team. The investigation yielded details about the accident, such as the estimated speed of Caserta's vehicle, which will be presented as evidence to support the charges being brought against Caserta. These details will be released after Caserta has appeared in court, campus officials have said.

The next step is a show cause hearing, at which the police will present evidence to a clerk magistrate to prove there is probable cause that Caserta would be found guilty of the charges should the case go to trial. Should probable cause be found, Caserta could be arraigned in Northampton District Court as early as this week.

Similar steps were taken in the death of UMass student Kerry L. Hines, 25, who died after she was struck by a car on Infirmary Way on Nov. 11. The driver of the vehicle that struck Hines, Apollos W. Ihedigbo, 52, of Amherst, was charged with vehicular homicide. He appeared in Northampton District Court in January, where he pleaded innocent to the charge.

Lustig was a sophomore biology honors student, majoring in psychology and education. She was also a member of the color guard for the Minuteman Marching Band last fall, and played the flute in the University Concert Band this spring. She lived on campus in Webster Residence Hall.

A funeral service was held for Lustig on Sunday, March 14 in Northborough. A memorial service will be held on campus at the Newman Center on Wednesday, March 31 at 6 p.m.

Chaplains and counselors are available for support for all members of the campus community; Mental Health can be reached at 545–2337, and the Dean of Students Office at 545–2684.

Balloonists achieve goal of travelling the globe

By Mort Rosenblum
Associated Press

MUT, Egypt — Bertrand Piccard, the Swiss psychiatrist–dreamer, and his British co–pilot Brian Jones set their globe–circling balloon down on remote Egyptian moonscape yesterday, linking the dawn of a new millennium with a civilization 5,000 years old.

"Up there it was grandiose, absolutely grandiose," Piccard said with a smile suggesting that was not the half of it. Several times he stopped trying to find words and fought back tears. Jones beamed at his side, nodding happily.

"We are so grateful for that invisible hand that guided us all the way, making the right things happen when they were supposed to," Piccard said.

Together they conquered the last great challenge of the air, floating more than 26,000 miles around the earth in their Breitling Orbiter 3. They crossed the "finish line" over Mauritania at 4:54 a.m EST Saturday.

At the end, strong winds over Libya boosted them to 39,600 feet and carried them on to a landing in Egypt.

Jules Verne fantasized the exploit in a novel called Five Weeks in a Balloon. But Piccard and Jones did it in less than three, combining space–age technology with the oldest of human motivations: guts and a quest for glory.

They carried amid their scant baggage a copy of A Life. Written by French novelist Guy de Maupassant and dedicated to Verne, it had been in Verne's personal library.

"To think that that book had been handled and read by Jules Verne, and we had it with us, too, to read — it was wonderful," Piccard said.

Jean Verne, great–grandson of the 19th century novelist, said he loaned the book to Piccard to bring the balloonist luck.

"I told him that if he stayed in the spirit of Jules Verne heroes, he would succeed this time thanks to that."

Piccard's wife, Michelle, waited in Cairo, biting her nails and calming her three young daughters. She had sat up until early yesterday with Swiss television crews, poring over maps while sifting through fragments of contradictory information on the balloon's trajectory.

She was Piccard's first thought after he emerged from the Egyptian army helicopter that brought the pilots from the landing site, a flat patch among dunes and rocky hills about 50 miles north of this oasis settlement in western Egypt.

"My next exploit will be something I've been wanting to do for a long time, which is sit with my wife and daughters and father in front of a warm fireplace and tell them about this trip," the 41–year–old doctor said.

Jones said the worst part was the cold.

"All of our water froze at night, so we waited till day to fill the kettles," he said. "It was very, very cold up there." Strong ground winds to the north forced them to aban-

Corrections since his arrest in November. He has pleaded innocent to all charges.

According to court documents, Chhim arrived at Bishop's sixth floor room in Cashin Residence Hall on Oct. 30, at approximately 9 p.m., to buy marijuana. Chhim "pulled a .380 caliber handgun from his clothing and aimed it at point blank range at Bishop's neck."

Bishop pushed the gun aside, but Chhim moved it back into range and fired the gun, "wounding Bishop and causing him serious injury." Chhim then aimed the gun at another student in the room, Josh Massin, before taking the marijuana and fleeing.

Massin called 911 and Detective Brian Narkewicz of the UMass Police Department responded to the call. At a dangerousness hearing last November, Narkewicz testified that he observed Bishop "lying in a pool of blood... with his head next to his bed." The bullet that injured Bishop had entered his neck, shattered a vertebrae and exited above his left shoulder.

don plans to reach the pyramids. They had to touch down at dawn, before winds blew too hard, and they settled on empty desert near here. By the time they reached Egypt, the two men who had flown 29,056 miles in 19 days, 21 hours and 55 minutes.

They landed at 8:02 a.m. local time yesterday (1:02 a.m. EST), but because of logistical foul-ups the helicopters brought them to the small airport here only at 3:40 p.m. (8:40 a.m. EST).

Piccard said that after spending nearly 20 days in a balloon, being marooned for more than seven hours in the desert wasn't so bad. "It was beautiful," he said of the barren terrain.

Winds tipped over the gondola after it finally set down. "We had to run around the balloon with our knives to make holes to keep from being dragged across the desert," Jones said. He added: "The balloon is a bit of a mess."

Jones, a 51-year-old pilot and balloonist, said he felt as deflated as the balloon physically. But he was clearly in high spirits.

"If you ask me now whether I'd do it again, I'd say no," he said. "But ask me later."

Each of the men had their down moments. On occasion Piccard used self-hypnosis to treat his own despair. But they learned quickly to settle potential friction.

Schizophrenia patients are given placebos, many symptoms worsen

BOSTON— Hundreds of patients who were seriously ill with schizophrenia were given sugar pills as part of pharmaceutical studies, according to a published report.

At least 850 patients were given the pills, known as placebos, in federally approved studies during the past decade, and up to 70 percent of the patients experienced such a worsening of symptoms that they had to withdraw from the trials, The Boston Globe reported yesterday.

At least one patient who was being given placebos committed suicide, according to the Globe, which reviewed experiment data from the studies, many of which were funded by pharmaceutical firms.

"God, they're treating the mentally ill like lab rats. This is absolutely outrageous," said Paul K. Ling, a Quincy psychologist and an activist who campaigns for greater access to care for the mentally ill.

Giving some patients placebos to allow comparison with other patients who are trying out a new drug is a common practice in trials of drugs for many medical conditions, especially when there is no good treatment for the condition.

But patients with cancer or fast-moving bacterial infections are rarely put on placebos. Instead, they are given medicine already known to work— which is then compared with the new medicine. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has long required the use of a placebo control in testing some drugs, including experimental antipsychotic medications, and drug companies and researchers have complied.

"We believe in good science. We believe in following FDA regulations," said Dr. Bert Spilker, senior vice president of scientific and regulatory affairs for the Pharmaceutical Research Manufacturers of America. As a result, he said, "Usually, good science and good ethics prevail."

The FDA and the National Institute of Mental Health now plan to review the use of placebos, and the FDA is sponsoring a symposium on the subject next month.

In its latest analysis, the newspaper looked at unpublished data submitted to the FDA in the 1990s by pharmaceutical firms for three antipsychotic drugs that have since been approved, Zyprexa, Risperdal, and Seroquel.

It also reviewed published literature for those drugs and a fourth, Serlect, which was withdrawn after safety questions arose. In one 1996 study, patients were said to have given "written informed consent" to the testing, even though they met "criteria for schizophrenia with acute exacerbation."

In a study of Zyprexa that ended in 1995, a 34-year-old man who was being given a placebo committed suicide, the Globe said. The newspaper could not reach FDA officials for comment. But FDA officials have said they require placebos to be used for scientific rigor, to make sure new drugs really are effective.

The U.S. government denied former support of the Taliban and promised to commit funds for women's grass roots organizations in Pakistan, and skill-building within Afghanistan.

Various news sources have emphasized that this is not a religious or cultural issue, but an issue of power and oppression.

The Revolutionary Association of Women of Afghanistan (RAWA), has attempted non-violently to provide needed health care and education to women. In 1987 one of RAWA's founding members was shot in her home along with two other family members. Even male doctors are being treated with suspicion, and are questioned routinely, making it difficult for them to practice.

The Taliban's grip on the country isn't showing signs of slipping; they actually have their own web site. Even in this country, Afghan women refused to comment on their experiences due to fear of retaliation from "terrorist" Taliban supporters located as close as Springfield.

With the accomplishment of Beautification a la Sledgehammer, the new display will change the way the middle of campus looks and the way traffic will flow through the area, Nelson said.

In helping to reach their goal, the Friends of the Library have set up a Lego library bank in the library lobby to help collect coins.

In addition, the library is giving out ribbons to people making donations of a dollar or more to the project. Already, the library fence has become strewn with ribbons, showing the communities support to re-build the fence.

For those too anxious to wait or if some feel the need to relieve some "old" fence disgust, people can take a "cyber- whack" at the old fence by visiting www.library.umass.edu/fence.

In these ways, students can take more than one "whack" at helping rebuild the image of the fencing around the library as a step towards the beautification of the entire campus.

"We thought maybe, with over 20,000 [students], this would be a chance to get more people involved so they will feel like they've participated in getting rid of the ugly old fence," Nelson said.

Ribbons can be purchased at the DuBois Library or in the Campus Center next week.

Eastwood's latest suffers from being *True*ly dumb

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

TRUE CRIME
Directed by Clint Eastwood with Clint Eastwood, James Woods, Isaiah Washington
Playing at Springfield Theaters

When we first get a glimpse of Clint Eastwood in True Crime, the aged actor is sitting at the corner of a bar, hitting on a beautiful young news reporter who's old enough to be his grandaughter. Moments later, he's in bed with his boss' wife, baring his chest and engaging in foreplay. The sight is something like seeing a rickety, old professor flirt with a student — in other words, stomach-turning.

But Eastwood is intent on proving that old age doesn't mean retirement, even if his filmmaking is slow, muddled, and utterly ridiculous. True Crime is not boring, but instead simply the worst crafted John Grisham movie to come out of mainstream Hollywood since The Chamber.

Critics have championed Eastwood's directorial patience and his attention to detail. I have no problem with that — in fact, the best part about True Crime is its slow, almost docudrama pace. But what simply cannot be ignored is a plot and characterization that belong in a Saturday night TV movie, not a big-budget Hollywood film.

Eastwood plays Steve Everett, a news reporter with a reputation for finding the big story simply by following his superb instincts. He also has a penchant for embarrasment, however, and is stuck working at the Oakland Tribune after getting pushed out of a big city New York paper. Everett is a womanizer, an adulterer, a ex-alcholic, and basically a selfish jerk. But we're supposed to love him anyway.

When the girl that Everett hits on is accidently killed in a car accident, Everett takes her position, covering a routine "human-interest story" about a murderer's last days on death row. In the midst of this, he has to deal with a jealous boss (a tense Denis Leary) and a chaotic homelife.

Of course, Everett, on a hunch, thinks the murderer is innocent. He has no facts whatsoever, and the killing happened six years ago, but he thinks he can solve the case in one day anyway.

Ridiculous, totally unrealistic plot devices like these are what make True Crime, which tries to be a realistic, hard- boiled movie, fall completely flat. The plot is completely predictable, and Eastwood finds his clues with about as much tact as a second grader — his sole moment of investigative glory is figuring out that a stack of potato chips would have blocked the witness' view. And they thought Bob Woodward was clever.

Another hopeless part of True Crime is Eastwood's character and his performance. Sure, it's admirable that he would construct a very flawed, selfish main character, but the end result is absolutely a soulless, complete idiot of a human being. He's the worst news reporter ever, he's uncaring, he's a womanizer, and he's dumb.

Yet, True Crime is about his redemption. But does he really feel sorry for his behavior? Do we care if he solves the case? Well, first of all, at the end of the film, he's still hitting on women 1/3 of his age. Second, he solves the case out of pure, dumb, stupid-plot-twist luck.

Eastwood is good at times, his calculated eyes helping him look smarter than his character is. But most of the time, he looks like an old grandfather that wandered out of the retirement home by accident.

I don't really want to admit it, but I suppose there are some redeeming features of True Crime. It features an excellent performance by Isaiah Washington, who plays the innocent murderer about to be killed. The interplay with his wife (an equally good Lisa Hay Hamilton) and daughter is heartbreaking and emotional. And the scenes with Eastwood and his own real-life daughter are cute and finely directed. One wishes Eastwood would drop the Absolute Power- Hollywood legal thriller crap and just make a film about an old wash-out and how he deals with his messed-up family life.

James Woods, as the Oakland Tribune's editor-in-chief, also has some great moments kidding with Eastwood. He's great fun despite being in such a bleak movie.

There's a moment at the end of the movie when I thought True Crime would be interesting — a tense finish after a ridiculous car chase. But then another stupid coincidence occurs, and one realizes that the editors at the Oakland Tribune were right — this should have been a human interest story. D-

Getting friendly with Four Weddings

By Nick Pizzolato
Collegian Correspondent

FOUR WEDDINGS AND A FUNERAL
Directed by Mike Newell with Hugh Grant and Andie MacDowell

The most endearing quality about Four Weddings is that it catches the fun and excitement of a wedding, as well as the melancholy and sorrow of a funeral, and still leaves the audience smiling. Taking his camera through the weddings and the funeral, Mike Newell treats the viewers as guests. He introduces us to not only the nine friends who go to these events, but also their friends and acquaintances.

We don't exactly know what these nine people do; we only see them at weddings. However, at the weddings we see how close they are. Hugh Grant is Charlie, the character which the story revolves around. With him are his seven friends and a brother who travel from one party to another, and each character seems to have something personal attached to the ceremony.

While being the best man at the first wedding, Charlie sees Carrie (Andie MacDowell) and is introduced to her at the reception. Instantly, with their first words, they are drawn to each other and a romance ensues, before they both make a hasty retreat to their different worlds. As the movie continues, Charlie's and Carrie's romance continues as their paths cross, despite some small but formidable blockades.

Although each wedding is a small story by itself, they are linked together through the familarity of the characters and themes. Each person has their own quirks which makes them realistic as well as familiar to the audience. Not only does each person have their own problems, but also charming real life characteristics — as well as individual beliefs on true love and why someone should get married. An idea that is asked throughout the movie is the question of whether or not love can strike like lightning. Each of the characters has an answer to this question (given in the form of a heartwarming monologue), but no real answer is reached, leaving the audience to decide for themselves.

All of these characters are charismatic and charming, leaving the audience looking forward to seeing more of their interactions. The camera catches the soft and safe side of humanity from each character as they go through personal problems with help from their friends. Showing that the British can be "Friends" just as well as any Americans, it is this interaction that gives the audience immediate kinship with the cast.

COURTESY STEPHEN SWADOSH

Andie MacDowell lends her smile to the cast of the heartwarming, funny classic Four Weddings and a Funeral.

Four Weddings can be enjoyed by guys and gals alike because it appeals to the human heart. The film is well-written, well-directed, and wonderfully acted (there's just something about Hugh Grant acting like an idiot and rambling like a madman that increases any film's hilarity factor). Nominated for Best Picture, it's a film that invites everyone with open arms, and is a definite must-see for anyone going to a wedding, anyone who has gone to a wedding, or anyone who is getting married. This is a film that will make you laugh, cry, and laugh again.

Students Unite

On March 3rd, over 500 people turned out to support the cause of Affirmative Action in a rally. That night, the Student Government Association discussed the issue at their regular Wednesday meeting. The interesting thing was that many were surprised that SGA addressed the issue. It was as though people did not think of SGA as a place where serious issues could be addressed. That is like thinking of a judicial court as a place where law does not belong.

This perception should be blamed on the SGA itself. One would be surprised to find major debate in SGA since it rarely bothers to deal with such issues. Perhaps it would surprise some readers to know that Mount Holyoke College Student Government had taken a stand on the issue of Affirmative Action by the start of last Wednesday's rally. Yet, the University of Massachusetts' Student Government Association did not even have a resolution under consideration by that time. Only after a rally with over 500 people did the Senate choose to act. Even then, the resolution failed to be accepted.

Michael Whitehouse

Many in the student body may assume that SGA does not handle such issues because it does not have the power to deal with them, but that is flatly not true. The SGA has as much power as the faculty senate on paper. The SGA also controls over $1.4 million and represents over 16,000 undergraduate students. The SGA is not without power. What SGA is lacking is will. It lacks the will to use its power to fight for the students' interests. Why should a senator go out on a limb for the students when almost all of the senators can expect to run unopposed during the next election?

This is not to say that all of the members of SGA lack will. Senator Seth Avakian who sponsored the senate resolution certainly showed the will to do what was necessary that night. President Shamapande, in saying that everyone should support the existence of the rally whether one supports the cause or not, certainly showed the will to support the students. However, such courage seems all too often to be lacking in SGA as senators worry about silly bills involving signs in DCs while major issues go unaddressed.

Some senators even try to deny the existence of the SGA's and the students' power. For example, when Paul Ferro stated that the rally on Wednesday "wasted his time," he was as much as saying that student action such as protests or SGA resolutions carried no weight and can have no effect. Unfortunately, too many senators hold the view that the student body and the Senate lack power, and thus they fail to act effectively.

I am sure that many of you agree that the SGA is much too inactive, but perhaps you are wondering what you can do about it. The answer is simple. On the 24th and 25th of March, the SGA election for president and trustee will be held. If the SGA realizes that the students care and that they are paying attention to what is going on around them, senators might start working for students and really doing their jobs. Voting is quick, easy, free, and profoundly powerful.

If you are as fed up with the inactivity of the SGA, the failure of the SGA to work for us, and the SGA's general inaccessibility as I am, get out there and vote. It is the only way to make such a profound difference in your community with so little effort. The power of the SGA can be mobilized and made to work for you the student. You just have to be sure and use your voting power to make it happen.

Not a racist society?

I will not lie about my opinion on the speech given by leading anti-affirmative action proponent Ward Connerly recently at Amherst College. I was extremely disgusted with his views. Granted, we are all entitled to our own opinions, but this guy was from another planet. After a line of questioning, he answered by stating repeatedly that he did not believe that we live in a racist society. Now, you don't have to be a supporter of affirmative action to know that racism exists. We might differ on how to fix society's problems, but we can all agree that racism exists.

Mr. Connerly constantly ignored statistics and facts that were presented to him as evidence of what would happen when affirmative action is dismantled. In fact, he stated that all the evidence in the world would not matter because "it is a value issue. It's about how you feel about the current criteria for admissions."

Mr. Connerly, how come you don't look into the value issues associated with our current system? As stated by an African American woman during the speech, the system is based on the exploitation of African Americans during slavery. Slavery in the United States was a system in which white males would profit from the free labor of blacks. This societal system was strong enough that it was not broken with the abolition of slavery. In fact, history proves that former slaves had no choice but to live in a pseudo-slavery status called share-cropping. Race differences continued in the form of segregation all the way up to the 1960s (and I'll say even today).

> "I believe that race does matter and that this is a racist society."
> Renee Gonzalez

Mr. Connerly stated that "it just so happens that blacks live in low-income neighborhoods" to strengthen his class-based affirmative action proposal. That is completely untrue. Blacks were forced to live in these neighborhoods by the racist society that they lived in. Often government loans given to white people for the purpose of home ownership were not given to blacks. This forced them to seek shelter in urban neighborhoods. Their descendants are still living in the same neighborhoods. Hence, it is not a coincidence. This was another manifestation of racism by society to keep blacks away from the opportunity to succeed.

I was also insulted by his remarks about which colleges should be open to minorities. According to Mr. Connerly, minorities could always go to community and state colleges. He also stated that we shouldn't worry so much about brand-name schools like Harvard and Amherst College because education is what we make of it.

Although I agree strongly that education is what we make of it, the fact is that our society practices unfair preferences for graduates of Ivy League schools such as Harvard. Therefore, it is essential for the equality of the races that these institutions have admissions criteria that are not discriminatory toward minorities and that allow a fair chance for minorities to enroll there.

My questions to Mr. Connerly himself pertained to his claims that "we as citizens must respect the laws and abide by the governing body of this country." He also stated that "I believe strongly in our system. I believe it will find a solution to this race problem."

Well, I don't Mr. Connerly. The fact of the matter is that our country is currently in a conservative right-wing swing, and our so-called "governing body" is racist as hell. I agree with his ideals of joining together and finding a solution to the race problem. I disagree with his statement that we could see a solution to the race problem in eight to ten years. What makes you think we can find a solution in such a short time span in comparision to the 200 years of struggle that have yielded mild results? What makes you think that the leaders of this country would even consider such a proposal? They haven't for the last 200 years! Get real!

Mr. Connerly firmly believes that "race does not matter" and that "this is not a racist society." I believe that race does matter and that this is a racist society.

You want proof, Mr. Connerly? Let's start out with the white conservative Republican club student in the corner of the chapel room who controlled the audience's microphone. It is not a coincidence that every time a black person went up to speak, the volume was lowered and the audience had to ask the student to bring the volume up again. Clearly, this was discrimination. Mr. Connerly, for you to witness such blatant discrimination against your own people should make you ashamed. Hope that you are right in your assumptions of what will happen after affirmative action is removed, for if you are wrong, I fear even Dante's Inferno won't have a place for you.

Just like paradise

Welcome back, boys and girls, from Spring Break! Given this unique time of year, I am confident that you all visited far–off, exotic locales. If you didn't go anywhere, you can live vicariously through me. If you have your own stories, write your own damn column. With that all said and done, lets get to my story. I bring up that famous introduction—

> "We hopped in our Porsche (Winstar Mini– van), and drove to our exotic vacation-land (Maine)."
> Shawn Downs

Once upon a time...

A few friends and I decided to go away for Spring Break. We all packed up our stuff, and hopped in our Porsche (Winstar Mini–van), and drove to our exotic vacationland (Maine). After many, many hours, we finally made it to our resort (Koenig's house), and started to unpack. We were met by some natives (Koenig's parents) and some local wildlife (Tom the dog, Betty the cat). Given the length of our journey, we relaxed in our waterbeds (that part is true), and feasted on wild chicken and native peas.

Knowing we were in paradise, we immediately set out to find some local attractions. We watched some stunning live entertainment (movies), and dined at fine restaurants (Ye Olde McDonalds, Freeport). Our trip would not be complete without seeing a celebrity or two, so we went out of our way to find some (Stephen King's childhood house, a couple of statues, and my hero, the guy who wears a tri–cornered hat and plays the flute to revolutionary songs). As with most tropical destinations, we were bound to run into some type of tropical storm, and we reveled in the warm, wet rain (froze in the frigid foot and a half of snow). Our fun was just beginning.

Since we were in paradise, we wanted to go to the beach (true). After a short drive (45 minutes), we reached the beach. As we walked along the beach, we talked and skipped stones, our feet stomping though the freshly fallen snow (still true). It was not long before we saw the beach parties (on MTV) and all the scantily clad women (also on MTV). All this walking and talking made us thirsty, and we knew that St. Patrick's day was around the corner. We wanted to wet our whistles, so we went to the nearest drinking establishment (Denny's) and drank ourselves silly (coffee and cherry cokes).

Knowing that an exotic Spring Break involved going to many destinations, we flew off to our next destination via Silver Bullet Express (uh, drove). Sadly, our travel was interrupted due to unforeseen circumstances like runway delays (car being frozen to the ground) and air traffic controller errors (traffic was bad). However, we reached our next destination in good spirits. We reached the self–proclaimed "Hub of the Universe" (Boston), and began to explore its ruins (Harvard). When our archaeology expedition was complete, we went to the house that Boo built (well, I did not build the house, but it's where I live). It was here that we parted, and I found myself alone (a single tear falls from my right eye).

It was Thursday, and I realized that most of my vacation had been spent in a whirlwind of activity. As I got the bill for this exotic vacation, my eyes opened in shock and amazement (it was nothing, no put that in your pipe and smoke it). With only two days to go, I figured I'd make the best of it. Since humanity was on the top of my list, I made myself useful to all those who happened to stop by my house (honest!). After diligently saving the world on numerous occasions (playing Age of Empires on my computer), I went back to school to continue to be educated (slack off) and to write this testament to all of you (why?).

There is a moral to this story and a cheesy moral it is. Thus it is written in the Book of Boo that, "While money hath the power to buy thou happiness, wisdom comes from being in company with one thou are happy with."(see, I can write in Ye Olde style too). If you could afford to go to the Caribbean, Mexico, or Disney World, more power to you. However, if you had a great break just chillin' with all your friends, even more power to you. Stay tuned for more excerpts from the "Book of Boo."

Escape from NY

The mayhem snuck up on me like a quiet thief in the back alleys of Philadelphia. The men's basketball team had just been eliminated from the Atlantic 10 Tournament by Xavier in the city of Brotherly Love. I had just entered the hotel room of my media cohorts, Brett and Cappucino, and I was all set to go see the hometown Flyers take on the Ottawa Senators. We were going to wake up early the next morning to continue our current tour of duty to Ithaca, NY, and were going to broadcast a lacrosse game two days later. After covering a hoops tournament, we were in need of a break, i.e. an evening on the town: some good hockey and some unbeatable cheese steaks. Perfection.

"We have to go to Ithaca now," Brett said, not only raining on my parade, but destroying my hopes and dreams as well.

"Ha ha." I nervously laughed, hoping to God that Brett was just being his usual facetious self. "Let's go get our tickets!"

"No," confirmed Cappacino. "We really have to go to Ithaca tonight. We got word from "The Boss" that we can't stay here another night."

"The Boss," for the record, is a shady, dark–haired student– radio head–man who, when one is extremely close to him, is known as "Mr. Perrault." Disobedience is severely punished when dealing with The Boss, so I immediately agreed that we should leave that night.

Cappacino, Brett and myself then took to the road for the trip of a lifetime — or so it seemed. The five–hour trip from Philly to Ithaca was highlighted by scenic views overlooking vast expanses of absolutely nothing, and so by the time we arrived at our destination — Cornell University — the three of us seriously thought that we had reached our 80th birthdays.

Blah.

"Great," We all thought in one joyous telepathic unity. "We're here... with no place to stay."

After deciding against staying at some fairly mediocre– looking place that felt it necessary to jack their prices well into the triple digits, our heroes settled on the Best Western in Ithaca.

Our criteria? The greasy guy behind the counter told us it would cost $88.91 for a room there and we had exactly $89 between the three of us. We were very selective.

As the sun rose the next morning, we hurried and repacked the car for another adventure — we like to think of ourselves as modern–day pioneers (glutton–for– punishment) — and, with the magic of banks and ATM's, headed completely off the beaten path for Niagara Falls and Buffalo. The weather was fine, the birds were chirping and all sorts of other nauseatingly optimistic sorts of things were going on, so we travelled on without worry. Regardless of the shining sun and perfect visibility, Cappacino managed to get the car stuck off the side of the road. With the help of some friendly New Yorkers, of which we met surprisingly many over the course of these few days, we returned to the pavement and rode on.

Seth Koenig

And rode on, and on, and on...

Upon arriving at the great Horseshoe Falls, Brett and I thought it wise to sprint at break–neck speed to the best viewing area of the natural wonder from the American side. Problem: Cappacino was looking the other direction when we left, and, because Brett and I are superb athletes who crush the sound barrier with a mere jog, we lost Cap'.

A good half an hour later, we all convened at the car, playfully referring to one another using four–letter words and the like, and we went the relatively short ride South to see the Buffalo Sabres take on the Dallas Stars. The Sabres won, 2–1. If you want highlights, go pop in some old USA Today microfiche at the library — I don't have the time for that here.

Moving on, Brett, being the driver at the time, figured he'd take Cappacino and myself to visit a dear friend of his in Rochester on the way back to our comfy pad in Ithaca.

To make a very, very long story short, this girl was home for Spring Break and we were caught in a storm. A very, very big and long storm... and there's no way I can make that short.

The ride to Ithaca, once a three–hour jaunt, became a six–hour rollercoaster ride, complete with riding fare.

And we rode on, and on, and on...

The next morning (yes, another "next morning"), the storm was still raging and the phone was ringing.

"Really."

Cappacino said to the mystery caller in an obviously disappointed voice. "Okay," he then finished, for some reason agreeing to go along with whatever evil thing the voice told him.

"The game has been postponed from this afternoon to this evening," he then relayed to the groggy duo of myself and Brett. "And it's been moved to Syracuse."

At that point in time, I decided to make peace with the notion that I would most likely never return to Amherst. Ever. My amigos and I would become the "Johnny Appleseeds" of UMass sports, and our families would forever wonder where we had gone. As for the never–ending trip, the car got stuck again at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse because of some groundskeeper's brilliant idea to plow all of the snow in the city into the exit of the parking lot.

However, it all started with that Flyers game...

BC stuns Hockey East; win tourney

BC and UNH receive automatic bids, Maine in, PC gets left in cold

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Boston College has done it again. The Eagles advanced to the Final Four of the Hockey East tournament at the Fleet Center this weekend as the No. 3 seed in the conference. But the team who has learned to win in crunch time, won another big tournament in March, and successfully defend their Hockey East Tournament Championship Title with a 5–4 overtime win over heavily favored New Hampshire (29–6–3).

New Hampshire was heavily favored heading into the contest, due to their recent beatings of Maine in the regular season finales, and their thumping of Merrimack and Providence College in the quarterfinals and semifinals of the tourney respectively.

But when BC (25–11–4) is playing in a tournament at the end of the year you can throw away the regular season records. Many are now looking to the Eagles as a team that is poised to make a run similar to the one they made at the end of last year that took them to the NCAA Championship game against 1998 National Chmapion, Michigan.

"When you have momentum you have great confidence and great anticipation of the next game. This will really help us in the NCAAs," BC's Jerry York said of his team's win streak. "You start winning and you get that jump to you, but our focus now is certainly the national title."

The Eagles came out like a team possessed, scoring four goals in the first period of the final. But as they are capable of doing, UNH fought hard to get back into the contest, scoring a goal late in the first, two in the second frame and culminating with a goal by UNH's Johnny Rogers with 4:42 remaining in regulation. Rogers cycled around the net and tucked the puck through the open legs of BC sophomore netminder Scott Clemmenson sending the Hockey East Tournament Final into overtime for only the third time in the conferences 15 year history.

The Eagles went 49 minutes without a goal until tournament MVP Blake Bellefeuille took the puck from a turnover caused by BC defenseman Brooks Orpik and walked in and shelfed one over UNH's sophomore netminder Ty Conklin's blocker to give the Eagles the 5–4 overtimes win.

Blake Bellefeuille won the Most Valuable Player Honors at this weekend's Hockey East Tournament in route to helping his team win the championship.

The Eagles rode the coattails of Bellefeuille and Jeff Farkas who lead the team in scoring in the final. Farkas registered the first two goals of the game for the Eagles, which was his 30th and 31st of the season.

"Jeff had a great tourney for us. He has had a bad shoulder the last couple of weeks, but it didn't seem to hurt him this weekend," BC coach Jerry York said of Farkas.

But the night belonged to Bellefeuille who not only had BC's final and most important goal, but he also scored their third goal on a similar top corner rifle shot that beat Conklin. Bellefeuille also collected an assist on Farkes' second goal of the game. Bellefeuille finished the tournament with nine points in only four games played to lead all scorers. Six of his nine points came on goals. Bellefeuille was also clutch in BC's win over No. 2 seed Maine in the semifinals, scoring two goals and an assist on another. The Framingham native was involved on all three tallies against the Black Bears in Friday night's game.

UNH clawed there way back in the game with the solid play in the cage by Conklin, and the explosive 10 second stretch in the second period where the Wildcats scored two goals, setting a new Hockey East Tournament record.

Jayme Filipowicz assisted on both goals in the second for UNH, and also had a helper on the first UNH goal. David Busch, a forth line winger, scored on a redirection of a Filipowicz shot at the 3:53 mark of the second frame. UNH scored again in record time when Filipowicz sent Jason Shiputski in and the junior forward from Saugus slipped one through Clemmensen's five–hole.

The win secured a NCAA berth for the Eagles that they would likely have received anyway, having played to a third place finish in arguably the best college hockey conference in the country.

How does the Tournament results affect the Hockey East teams in terms of the NCAA tourney pairings. UNH gets the No. 1 seed in the East and will have a bye in the first round, and will await the winner of Michigan/Denver.

Boston College received a No. 4 seed in the west regional to be played in Madison, WI, and draw No. Michigan.

Maine on the other hand who lost a tough game in the semis to BC, gets the No. 3 seed in East and will play a tough Ohio St. team. In the Maine/BC semifinal on Friday night Maine coach Shawn Walsh felt that the three goals that were reviewed in that game could have cost his team a better seeding.

"You know if one of those three reviews goes our way then we would still be playing in overtime tonight," Walsh said after dropping the semifinal contest.

The semifinal loss for Providence was the most damaging loss of the weekend for any of the teams.

"We are out." Providence coach Paul Pooley said after his teams 6–2 loss to UNH friday night. "That has to be the most disappointing thing about this season, is that we lost five games early that we should have won, and if we have those wins then we have a bid."

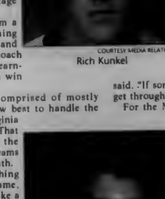
Lacrosse splits Spring Break pair

After Fairfield win, Minutemen fall to No. 4 VA

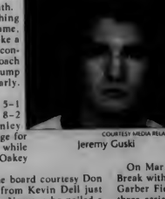


By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — At the beginning of the season, when the members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team looked at the 1999 schedule, they knew their contest with Virginia would be the toughest test of the early season.

The Cavaliers (2–1) proved that theory correct Saturday, as they defeated the visiting Minutemen 15–9 at U–Hall Turf Stadium.

But for No. 19 UMass (2–2) the game was more than just a contest against the No. 4 team in the nation. It was a learning experience that should help the team set the stage for the rest of the season.



"If you can get anything from a loss, you need to learn something about character of each other and character of the team," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "You are learning about yourself whether you win or lose."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Rich Kunkel

One thing UMass, a team comprised of mostly underclassmen, learned was how best to handle the intensive attacks teams like Virginia can put on an opponent's cage. That could prove valuable because the Minutemen face the top three teams in the country over the next month.

"We talked a lot about pushing the tempo hard early in the game, not giving them the chance to take a breath, not letting them get any confidence in the game," Cavalier coach Dom Starsia said. "We tried to jump on them and put it to them early. We were able to do that."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS
Jeremy Guski

For Virginia, that meant a 5–1 after the first quarter and a 8–2 halftime advantage. Hanley Holcomb led the first–half charge for the Cavaliers with a hat trick, while Tucker Radebaugh and Henry Oskey has two goals apiece.

UMass, meanwhile, got on the board courtesy Don Little, who one–timed a pass from Kevin Dell just outside the UVA crease, and Jay Negus, who nailed a shot from 15 yards out.

Whatever nerves the Minutemen may have had in the first half dissipated when the teams returned afterintermission. Jeremy Guski notched the first second–half score with a unassisted tally on an extra–man opportunity.

With 6:22 remaining in the third, Rich Kunkel, who had a stellar nine–point outing against Fairfield the weekend before, answered a Radebaugh score with a goal off a pass from Dell. Guski scored his second of the game three minutes later, taking the ball around the game to Cavalier goaltender Derek Kenney's right before firing a close–range shot.

But the Cavaliers struck late in the third with a pair of back–breaking goals when Radebaugh and Jason Hard both scored with under 18 seconds remaining in the quarter.

"In the third we were outscoring them 3–1 and they scored two in the last minute. Virginia gave us an opportunity and we didn't seize it. We didn't take advantage of it," Cannella said. "If somebody gives you an opening you've got to get through it, no matter what you do."

For the Minutemen, however, that opening closed too quickly. In the fourth quarter, four different Cavaliers scored to put the game away.

Now the Minutemen must focus on Hofstra, and they will use the contest against the Cavaliers as a learning experience for what the rest of the season will bring.

"This definitely prepares us for the better teams because Virginia is one of the better teams out there. This really gets us used to the quality of lacrosse that is the top–notch level," Negus said.

"We just need to make sure we concentrate on the things we need to do. Bring on the next team. We've got Hofstra next weekend and we're going to be ready for them," he said.

On Mar. 13, the Minutemen started their Spring Break with a 15–6 downing of Fairfield at Richard F. Garber Field. Kunkel led UMass with six goals and three assists, while Guski, John Madigan, Negus and Keith Gabrielli added two tallies each.

1998.

On defense, two–time Northeastern Region All–American Lynne Young led the way, getting help from a variety of sources.

"[Denise] Brey has been playing consistently strong in the middle," credited McClellan. "She and [Jessica] Passanese have been a force."

The win was UMass' second of the season, as the Minutewomen began their 1999 season with a 10–3 shellacking of Harvard at Garber Field on March 14. Senior co–captain Laura Korutz, who was relatively quiet against UNH, recorded a hat trick in the opener, supported by Ingraffea and Noelle Gorski — each of whom tallied two goals.

Against the Terriers at Nickerson Field a half a week later, the squad did not fare so well, falling behind 7–0 before Gorski put the first point on the board for Massachusetts eight minutes into the second half in the 8–3 loss.

The Minutewomen will try to work through their losses and defeat Vermont Wednesday, when they do battle in Amherst. With the early season troubles with turf, McClellan and her staff hope that Totman will be ready in time.

5–2/3 innings but was backed up by an impressive offensive spray. Santos relieved the lefthander and hurled two scoreless innings complete with three strikeouts. UMass and Lafayette exchanged runs before the Minutemen (2–1 hits), once again let loose with five runs in the top of the seventh.

SATURDAY

The Minutemen closed out their Spring Break with a resounding 17–0 thumping of Central Connecticut.

Though UMass clearly improved over the week, much can be said for the Southern teams' benefit of being able to play outside beginning in January. However, as the Minutemen progressed both pitching and hitting improved.

UMass softball improves to 13–6

UM upsets defending champ Fresno St; Ace records no–no

By Matt Frascella
Collegian Staff

While most students spent last week relaxing and enjoying their Spring Break, the Massachusetts softball team was hard at work winning games. The No. 22 Minutewomen embarked on a very fruitful trip to Florida over the break, improving their record to 13–6.

The trip began last weekend at the Florida State Invitational Tournament. On March 12 the Maroon and White opened its pool play with a convincing 4–0 win over the Marshall Thundering Herd. Powered by senior Mandy Galas who went 2–for–2 with two runs batted in and an inside–the–park home run, UMass jumped out to an early 3–0 lead in the first two innings and never looked back. Freshman Jen Hadley recorded the first win of her collegiate career, allowing only five hits.

Sophomore Carrie Jeffries gave up two runs in the first inning to UMass' second opponent, Robert Morris, before settling down to blank it the rest of the game and record the win. Despite leaving 10 runners on base, the Minutewomen scored six runs on seven hits including a home run by freshman Cherra Wheeler. Fellow freshman Ashley Baaken went 2–for–3 and sophomore Debbi Tomoguchi led UMass with a 2–for–4 performance.

The Massachusetts women's softball team went 7–1 over the break including wins over Georgia and No. 3 Fresno St.

Day two of the tournament proved to be just as impressive for the UMass squad as it blanked Georgia, 1–0. Senior pitcher Danielle Henderson stoned the Bulldogs by striking out 14 batters and walking only one en route to her ninth career no–hitter. The lone Minutewoman run came in the bottom of the seventh when Wheeler singled to left. Wheeler eventually came home thanks to two Georgia errors.

Defending National Champion and current No. 3 Fresno State was next up for the Minutewomen in the championship game. In a contest that pitted two of the nation's top pitchers, Henderson and UMass came out on top 1–0 in nine innings to win the tournament.

The gold medal game showcased the two aces. Fresno's Amanda Scott who pitched eight scoreless innings while striking out 13, but Henderson proved to be better on this day, striking out 12 while stranding nine Fresno State base runners. She helped to nail down the UMass win by striking out the final two batters in the bottom of the ninth.

The one UMass run came in the top of the ninth when junior Nikki Faessler singled home Wheeler from third.

Henderson's excellent play earned her the Most Valuable Player of the tournament while Galas and Wheeler were named to the All–Tournament Team.

Even though the tournament was over, the wins did not stop for the Minutewomen. On March 15 the team won its fifth straight in Florida as it edged out Western Illinois 1–0 to improve to 12–5 on the season. Jefferies threw a no–hitter for the Maroon and White. The only run of the game came in the sixth inning when senior Becky George hit a bloop single to score Teri Rooney from third.

On the following day Massachusetts returned to action for a double–header against Florida State. In the first game Henderson struck out 10 Seminole batters to win her third game of the trip, 2–1. The victory improves her record to 10–2 on the year. Galas drove in the first UMass run in the fifth inning and scored the winning run in the seventh off the bat of Rooney.

In the second game the Minutewomen were blasted 6–0. It was their only loss of the eight game Florida trip. Hadley fell to 2–1 on the year, allowing all six runs over five and two–thirds innings. Hadley pitched three scoreless innings before running into some trouble in the fourth. The Seminoles did most of their damage in the sixth when they scored four runs.

UMass will participate in the Princeton Invitational Tournament next weekend before its home opener on April first.

UM swept out of playoffs by Maine

ORONO, Maine — The Massachusetts hockey team (12–21–2) concluded its 1998–99 season with a 5–2 loss to the Maine Black Bears (27–5–4) in the quarterfinal round of the Hockey East tournament on March 12th at Alfond Arena in Orono, Maine.

The Minutemen fell victim to a great performance by Hobie Baker Candidate Paul Kariya and some shaky officiating. Kariya buried two goals in the series–ending win for the Black Bears.

"Besides giving credit to Maine, a high–skilled, well coached team, we just saw a great performance from Steve Kariya tonight," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "It was one of the best performances I've seen in Hockey East to date. He played like a man possessed, and we just couldn't contain him," UMass coach Joe Mallen said.

Maine also received scoring from junior forward Cory Larose who netted his 20th goal of the season, which was the eventual game–winner with under a minute remaining in the second period.

The goal by Larose was a direct result of a penalty called to Kris Wallis for holding the stick at the 17:57 mark of the second period. Not only did Larose score a back–breaker 1:19 into the penalty, but the man advantage killed all the momentum that the Minutemen had acquired from their recent comeback.

The Minutemen fell behind 2–0 early, and with 3:28 left in the second Ray Geever made a great individual rush to notch UMass' first goal of the night. Then 39 seconds later alternate captain Jeff Blanchard scored on a wrister through the pads of Maine netminder Alfie Michaud to tie the game at 2–2.

"The timing of that call was pretty tough. Our kids claw and scratch their way back into the game, and I thought it was a well–officiated series until here we are 2–2 at their place with two minutes to go in the period and we're in the box," Mallen said. "I thought that up to that point our kids had played very well."

After Maine regained the one goal edge at 3–2, the momentum shifted in its favor. The Black Bears capitalized again with only 10 seconds remaining in the second frame when Ben Gulte won the face–off and directed the puck right to Dan Kerluke. He let a shot go close to the ice and it smack past UMass goalkeeper Markus Helanen, which gave Maine a 4–2 lead it would never relinquish.

The Wallis call was not the only questionable call of the evening for referee Tim Bennedetto. On the Blackbears second goal, Bennedetto missed another huge call. Geever had a fabulous rush up ice but when he took the puck to the net Michaud made a great save. During the play the net came off its moorings, and Maine consequently went up ice and scored with only 24 seconds left in the first period. Rules dictate that the official is obligated to blow the play dead when the net is dislodged.

"I saw that the net had come off it's moorings but I thought that the puck was still in the zone and I tried to push it back but I couldn't get it on," Geever said.

Kariya capped off his night by scoring his second goal late which helped solidify the win for the Blackbears. The win also meant that Maine advanced to the FleetCenter for the Hockey East Semlfinals, where the Black Bears fell to Boston College.

Maine's two–game quarterfinal sweep of the Minutemen marked the second time the Black Bears have ousted UMass from the Hockey East playoffs. The Black Bears knocked off the Minutemen in 1995 in a single–elimination quarterfinal matchup with a 7–4 win.

For the Minutemen Dean Stork had a productive game, collecting assists on both UMass goals which brought his season totals to nine goals and seven assists for 16 points.

Blanchard also had a good series for the Minutemen scoring two of UMass' three goals, bringing his season total to 11 goals and upping his point total to 27.

Markus Helanen also shined, making 43 saves on 48 shots in this game and gave the Minutemen a 40–save effort in the first game of the series whichthe Minutemen lost 3–1.

The loss ended a productive season for the Minutemen. The youngest team in the nation had a lot of firsts this year. It registered its first win over Boston University since 1920, and its first win against the Terriers since becoming a member of Hockey East in 1995.

The Minutemen also had their most wins against Division I opponents with 12, and the program's most Hockey East wins in their history with eight. Mallen has a lot of reasons for being optimistic for next year's campaign.

"I think the biggest key is keeping everybody together. I feel that right now this team has a lot of character. We have a lot of people with lots of ability who have improved a great deal this season, and we have a lot of reasons to be optimistic," Mallen said.

UM baseball wins 5 of 8 in nine day road trip

By Kathleen Ralls

What a difference latitude makes.

In a whirlwind eight–game, nine–day road trip to Florida, the Massachusetts baseball team beat five different schools to improve to 5–6 on the young season. Its three losses fell at the hands of its first opponent, South Florida.

FRIDAY

The Minutemen opened their three–game series with the Bulls in a 12–5 loss. After a scoreless first inning, South Florida exploded in the bottom of the second with seven runs. Bulls rightfielder Mike Barclay went 2–for–3 with a home run while driving in three runs. UMass second baseman Shaun Skeffington knocked in one of two runs to cut the lead to five in the third. The Minutemen would tack on two more runs in the top of the sixth inning before South Florida put the game on ice with five more runs.

Brian Hourigan let up seven runs to earn the loss as Craig Szado and freshman Jesse Santos came on in relief.

SATURDAY and SUNDAY

Still licking their wounds, UMass fought back to a tie at the end of nine, Saturday. Nonetheless, the Bulls would squelch any of the Maroon and White's hopes to clinch the game in the bottom of the eleventh inning, winning 8–7. On Sunday, South Florida whipped the Minutemen in a one–sided 16–2 game. UMass fell to a dismal 0–6.

MONDAY

Off. A little wiffle ball on the beach and its back to the diamond tomorrow.

TUESDAY

A breakthrough game for Massachusetts, as the offense and the defense made an impressive statement as it downed Canisius 11–2. North Adams State transfer Todd Samolewicz earned the win as he allowed just four hits and struck out nine in 6–2/3 innings. Bryan Mazzaferro went 2–for–5 with a triple and two RBI. Steve Asadoorian also helped himself at the plate, going 3–for–4 with two RBI and two stolen bases. Aaron Braunstein and Seth Klaplan along with freshman redshirt Scott Anderson had two hits apiece to help the cause.

WEDNESDAY

Southpaw Chris Szado stood his ground on the mound, lasting eight innings and allowing just six hits to defeat Lafayette, 12–3. The sophomore also struck out a career–high eight batters. Brian Blumsack pitched a scoreless ninth.

The offense poured It on in the third, delivering eight runs on three Lafayette errors. Catcher Brian Samela had 2 hits and drove in two runs while Braunstein went 2–for–4 with a RBI and a run scored. Nate Lang and Nick Gorneault also added two hits.

THURSDAY

Mazzaferro belted his first round–tripper of the year in the top of the second as the senior drove in four runs and went an impressive 4–for–5 to lead the Minutemen to a 10–6 win over Niagara. Bill Cooke earned his first win of the year as he relieved Hourigan in the fourth inning. The lefthander allowed just one run and racked up five Ks for the win. Mike Kulak made his first collegiate start in right field and also scored a run for the Minutemen.

UMass held a tight 6–5 lead over the Purple Eagles but were able to hold them to just one more run while adding four of its own in the final frames.

FRIDAY

In the teams' second meeting of the week, UMass rallied 10 runs off 10 hits in the first inning, including two by Mazzaferro, who extended his hitting streak to five games, to defeat Lafayette 18–11. Travis Veracka allowed nine runs in

Injuries woes plaguing UM women's lacrosse

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Although the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team finished its Spring Break with an 8–6 victory over New Hampshire, Saturday, the turf of Garber Field left the Minutewomen with a bit–terwest afterstate.

Away from its regular stomping ground of Totman Field, because the field is still recuperating from a brutal winter season, the team moved across campus to play their home games at the less familiar Garber.

Tara Durkin

In the win, UMass (2–1) lost junior Colleen Wales for an undetermined amount of time to the ever–present dangers of artificial turf, while goalie Tara Durkin, among others, suffered minor injuries due to the controversial playing surface.

Down 1–0 to the Wildcats with 14:26 to go, Wales' knee buckled as she attempted to outmaneuver a UNH defender at the top of the circle during an offensive setup.

"It was the exact same spot on the field where I was," junior Minutewoman Katie Carey said, recollecting the instant she tore her anterior cruciate ligament just over a year ago. "I was very worried for her. It brought back a lot of emotion."

Carey missed her sophomore year of lacrosse with the injury, and the sight of Wales going down drew tears from the recently–recovered attacker. Luckily for her, the early prognosis is fairly good.

"I don't think it's the ACL," Wales said. "It might be cartilage. [The doctors] don't think It's that bad, so I'm pretty excited about that."

Later In the half, as the last few seconds ticked off the clock, Durkin fell to the turf untouched while making a simple clearing pass, and was down long enough to draw the attention of coach Francesca McClellan and the UMass medical staff. Although the goalie started the second half, Garber Field had taken its toll.

"(Durkin) ought to be alright," McClellan said of the future of the Massachusetts net–minding. "Her ankle might be a bit sore tomorrow, but nothing real serious."

The team was already playing without the services of potent offensive threat Stephanie Pavlick, who has missed the recent action due to a family emergency.

Still, the team pulled out a victory, rebounding from Wednesday's 8–3 loss at Boston University that a disappointed McClellan described as a game during which "we didn't come to play."

"The nice thing about today's game is that we had a bench that participated," the coach said. "The kids on the field wanted to win and wanted to perform."

Picking up the slack on offense were sophomores Fay Naber and Rachel Ingraffea, and junior midfielder Rebecca Minaker. The trio scored one, two, and three goals, respectively, on Wildcat goaltender Shelby Hodgkins, who was 15th in the nation in save percentage in

UMass season ends with many high hopes for the next year

ORONO Me. — Many of them were sitting just outside the locker room at Alfond Arena. Some stared blankly at the walls, while others were talking quietly. All of them, however, were wondering how a promising season could already be over, and what it might be like to wake up the next morning without having to worry about lacing up skates.

Within a span of 34 seconds, the 1998–99 season quickly came to a close for the Massachusetts hockey team. After tying the game at 2–2 in the second period of game two of the Hockey East quarterfinals with the University of Maine, the host Black Bears netted two scores in the final minute of the frame to close the books on the series and the season for their counterparts from UMass.

"We gave them a lot. We gave them all they could handle. Obviously I'm very proud of this team," UMass coach Joe Mallen said. "Our guys did a great job and they did so many things right on the season. We've got a young team and a lot of guys coming back for next season."

Maine may have been one of the top teams in the nation coming into the series, but it was evident that the Minutemen weren't going to just hand the series over to the Black Bears. Game one was certainly not a walk in the park for the hosts, as UMass stuck with them for the full 60 minutes before eventually falling to Maine by a 3–1 score.

The next night was more of the same. The Black Bears took a 2–0 lead after the first period thanks to a non–call by referee Tim Benedetto that resulted in Maine's second goal. UMass winger Ray Geever knocked the Black Bears net off its moorings following a rush, but Benedetto and his linesmen never saw it. Maine forward Bobby Stewart collected a loose puck on the ensuing series and beat Minutemen goalie Markus Helanen to give his team a two–goal lead.

Michael Kobylanski

The Black Bears figured that they could turn game two into a laugher, but UMass turned up its intensity at both ends of the ice In the middle frame. Sure enough, the Minutemen finally broke through against Maine goalie Alfie Michaud at the 16:32 mark of the period on a goal by Geever. The sophomore winger, who was playing in his first game in a month after suffering a separated shoulder, completed a great individual effort by sliding a bid through the pads of Michaud.

With Maine still in a partial state of shock, UMass capitalized again only 39 seconds later to tie the game. Captain Dean Stork led a Minutemen rush and found Jeff Blanchard, who fired a shot from the slot through Michaud's five–hole to knot the score to two apiece.

But the Black Bears aren't the No. 4 team in the country for nothing, and they proved their worth with those two late second period goals before warding off any UMass comeback attempts in the third period.

Despite the sour ending to the season, there is a very good chance that the Minutemen are on the verge of taking the next step up the Hockey East ladder. No one expected them to do much this season — except themselves — and they responded against the criticism by tying the mark for most overall wins in a campaign, as well as setting a new mark for HE wins with eight.

"We (UMass) set a new standard for Hockey East wins, beating Boston University for the first time, making the playoffs and finishing as high as we did in Hockey East," Mallen said. "I also told them that if they want to get to the next level, the FleetCenter, they have to do more things right, the things that Maine did right."

For right now, things appear to be falling into place for next season. A team that was the youngest in the nation this year will have a season of post–season experience under their belts when next March rolls around.

However, there is still one major question that lurks on the horizon for the Minutemen. Although UMass will lose only senior Bryan Fitzgerald after this season, will top players such as Helanen and Blanchard elect to leave Amherst and follow Stork into the professional ranks? Should those players choose to stay and the entire roster returns, there is good reason to believe that the task which Mallen set out to do when the program was reinstated — build UMas hockey to a national contender — will be accomplished in the near future.

Simmons gives White House women's talk

Ruth Simmons, the president of Smith College.

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Smith College President Ruth Simmons spoke last Monday about women's civic involvement in the 20th century at a series event hosted by President William Iefferson Clinton and First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The talk was sixth in a series of millennium lectures and events at the White House about contributions made since the turn of the century. Televised on C–SPAN and broadcast live over the Internet, the discussion focused on the range of contributions women have made.

Simmons, who has been the president of Smith College for three years, was the daughter of sharecroppers and was one of 11 children. Mrs. Clinton, who introduced her, told the audience that Simmons has often said, "My mother has taught me more about life than any course I've taken."

"As a college president," said Simmons, "I have had the privilege of welcoming young women and seeing where they stand in relation to history, and a few years later I'll have the joy of seeing them off into the work world."

Simmons said the pleasure comes from seeing the graduates finally able to "choose their own path."

"I think that phrase adequately captures the change in women's lives over the last several years," she said.

"Women are able to choose their path."

She added that women need to be able to protect their well–earned freedom, and "a precious thing — ownership of themselves."

Not only should public activists be commended for their efforts, Simmons said, but also "common people."

Simmons' own mother and grandmother were bound by the legacy of slavery. However, through their courage she said, her mother "pushed down the walls that limited them," allowing her children to see freedom in their lifetimes.

When a women in the audience asked Simmons specifically about the role of women of color in the movement, she brought up the recent governmental policy changes regarding affirmative action.

"It's not enough for women to achieve equal rights. It's not enough for just white women to have equal rights; we can't leave anyone out," she said.

Affirmative action, Simmons said, is not a panacea, but it has provided many opportunities for women; white women in particular.

"I don't want to see women of color left behind," she said.

Simmons will appear tomorrow night in "Black and White: Affirmative Action in America" (10 p.m., PBS) a role– playing special, also featuring affirmative action opponent Ward Connerly. The two will both play in a hypothetical situation as parents of a minority student who is admitted to a university over a white student with identical credentials.

Jury for Chhim shooting trial chosen

Opening statements, prosecution's first witness scheduled today

By Stacey Shackford
Collegian Staff

Jury selection began yesterday in the trial of Sokha Chhim, the Amherst resident being charged with attempted murder in the shooting of former University of Massachusetts student Russell Bishop last semester.

Judge Judd Carhart addressed a courtroom full of potential jurors in Hampshire County Superior Court in Northampton in the morning. He briefly discussed the nature of the case and presented a number of questions for them to consider when evaluating whether they could serve as impartial jurors.

"The defense is presumed innocent and cannot be convicted until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt," he reminded them. "The burden of proof lies with the prosecution, not with the defendant... do you understand that?"

Jurors who answered yes to any of the judge's questions about impartiality were asked to approach the bench, where they were further questioned by the judge and both attorneys. The process lasted a few hours, during which time the jury of 14 was selected from the original pool of approximately 50 candidates.

Carhart also heard a number of motions from defense attorney Joseph A. Franco, including a motion to suppress testimonies collected from several witnesses in which they identified Chhim as the person who shot the 25–year–old Bishop in his Cashin dorm room on Oct. 30.

In a trial that will rely heavily on witness identification, Franco argued that the photographic array of possible suspects that witnesses viewed were unfairly suggestive of Chhim. Franco questioned the inconsistent racial makeup of the series of arrays shown to witnesses — some arrays were composed entirely of "Oriental" suspects, while other arrays included Hispanic suspects as well. Carhart agreed to consider the motion, but did not reach a conclusion by the end of the session.

The trial continues today. Franco and Assistant District Attorney David Ross will present opening statements at 9 a.m. The jury will then visit the Cashin dorm room in which Bishop was shot, and will return to Northampton to continue the trial. Bishop will be testifying as the state's first witness.

OASIS club setting to open despite order from Planning Board

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The controversy is continuing as a private club gets ready to open in the space currently used by Pruddy's Bar and Restaurant despite the Amherst Planning Board voting down an application to allow the club to do so.

"It's not dead. It's going forward and it's not going to disappear," said Prudencio Gomez Sr. owner of Pruddy's and a member of The One and All Society for International Souls (OASIS) Club.

OASIS has already sent its 100 members their identification cards and will only be allowing the card holders to enter the doors of what is cuirrently Pruddy's at 30 Boltwood Walk starting this month or next month, Gomez said.

This action would fly in the face of a Feb. 18 Planning Board decision to not approve a site plan review application for OASIS. The Board said OASIS cannot use Pruddy's space without its approval of the application.

But that vote should never have happened in the first place, according to Joanne DeLong, attorney for Pruddy's and OASIS and member of OASIS's Board of Directors.

"I don't think they had any authority to vote on anything," DeLong said, in an interview after the Board's Feb. 18 vote.

DeLong had withdrawn the application for a site plan review from the Planning Board on Feb. 11 because she said OASIS didn't need the Board's approval to use Pruddy's space.

"I was lead to believe that it was necessary for the club to go before the Planning Board in order to 'get permission' to operate on the site... by the clear language of the by–laws, no site plan review shall be required as the club will only be changing signage," DeLong wrote in her Feb. 11 letter withdrawing the application.

But the Board voted during its Feb. 18 meeting to ignore DeLong's letter withdrawing the application because it came in after the Feb. 10 deadline for public comment to be submitted on the issue.

With the Planning Board standing behind their decision, and OASIS standing ready to open its doors, Building Commissioner William Start is meeting with the Town Council to decide what the town can and will do.

"We're toying with a couple of things [but they] haven't finalized anything," Start said.

But finalizations won't be coming Start said, until a decision is made by Hampshire Superior Court. The court will decide whether to uphold or overturn a decision by the Amherst Zoning Board of Appeals that denied a special zoning permit for Pruddy's

Alan Seewald, lawyer for the Town of Amherst, would not comment on any legal action the town could or would take when OASIS opens.

But the town will have some time to make decisions because becoming a club will be a gradual process, Gomez

Elections for Student Government Association President, Trustee and Area Governors will take place tomorrow and Thursday of this week. Tonight a live debate between presidential candidates and trustee candidates will take place at 8 p.m. It will be aired live on Union Video Center (UVC TV–19) and on WMUA, 91.1 FM.

Besides SGA candidates being on the ballot, MASSPirg will have its bi–annual referendum as well. According to Liz Kennedy, the MASSPirg campus organizer "It is an opportunity to support MASSPirg through a waivable fee."

The vote is to keep the MASSPirg fee on tuition bills as it currently is. Even though the fee is placed on student's tuition bills students will continue to have the right to waive the fee if they do not want to monetarily support MASSPirg.

Voting stations will be set up in Franklin, Worcester, Berkshire and Hampshire Dining Halls as well as the Campus Center Concourse and the Newman Center. The stations will be open between the hours of 11 a.m.–2 p.m. and 4 p.m. to 7 p.m. on both days.

Amherst Select Board hears parking warrant articles

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Town parking bylaws would be under construction and all plans for the parking garage on Boltwood Walk would hit a red light if two warrant articles introduced during last night's Select Board meeting are passed in a Town Meeting.

Nancy Gordon, an outspoken opponent of the planned parking garage and proponent of changes in bylaws aimed at stopping Amherst streets from being used as surrogate parking lots for University of Massachusetts commuters, entered into heated discussion about the issues with Board members last night.

One of the warrant articles calls for, among other items, parking permits for spaces on residential streets to be given only to the street's residents.

Gordon's warrant article would eliminate the possibility of students buying the permits. But questions were raised about the practicality of limiting the permits to residents.

"[This would] reduce parking [when] residents who have off street parking have the permits," said Select Board Chairperson Brian Harvey.

If the article is passed during the April To0wn Meeting it would change the parking permit system already being discussed by the Parking Commission.

The Commission's current plan which, vice–chairperson Margaret Roberts stressed is still a work in progress, gives permits for spaces lining and adjoining the center of Amherst. The permits would cost $25 per year.

Roberts said she would like the system to be in place by the summer but said the effort to consider everyone's opinions and making the system fair means the process could be carried past the summer months.

"The main concern is keeping students from parking downtown then taking the bus [to campus]," Roberts said.

But Gordon served up another plate of parking debate with the introduction of a second warrant article.

Citing projected budget deficits, Gordon said the parking garage was a waste of money that would not pay for itself and would ultimately force the town into a tough position.

"The critical issue is here whether you want to take the financial risk that we may be faced with a structure where we have to choose funding the educational system in this town or funding the garage," Gordon said.

"That does seem a bit alarmist," Harvey said, later adding that the garage was a small risk and would have a small financial impact on the town and would not force the town to choose between education and parking.

Harvey argued that the garage would bring revenue into the town through the parking fees but also by the increased number of shoppers that would come to the downtown area.

"If you want people [to come] then we should offer parking. ample parking," said Board member Dolly Jolly.

OPEC induces increase in oil prices worldwide

By Bruce Stanley
Associated Press

VIENNA, Austria — OPEC's plan to reduce the world's oil supply by 2.6 percent has already translated into a spike in prices at gasoline pumps in the United States and elsewhere. Formal approval of the production cuts today would push gasoline prices even higher, analysts say.

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries is widely expected to approve cuts in oil output totaling 2.1 million barrels a day, in a unified effort with nonmembers to strengthen prices for crude that had languished at a 12–year low as recently as December.

OPEC oil ministers have said the organization plans to reduce daily output by its members to 1.72 million barrels. Non–OPEC producers like Mexico, Norway, Russia and Oman are expected to account for additional cuts totaling 388,000 barrels a day. The agreement to curtail production was reached two weeks ago by the group's three biggest members — Saudi Arabia, Iran and Venezuela — together with Mexico and fellow OPEC member Algeria. Crude prices responded by jumping almost $3 a barrel, and gasoline prices began to follow suit.

"After it became evident that OPEC was going to cut production, the price at the pump really began to move quickly," said George Gaspar, an analyst with Robert W. Baird and Co., a financial services firm based in Milwaukee.

The average price of all grades of gasoline at U.S. service stations surged nearly 8 1/2 cents per gallon over the past two weeks, according to the Lundberg Survey. It said that was the steepest and fastest increase since Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990.

Prices shot up more than 9 percent at self-service pumps in the United States, where unleaded regular averaged nearly $1.03 in the latest survey, compared with just over 94 cents two weeks ago, according to Lundberg.

Analysts say OPEC's program to reduce production accounted for at least half of the rise in gasoline prices. That's because refiners, who buy crude oil and process it into gasoline, were quick to pass their higher costs on to consumers.

Another factor behind the more expensive gasoline has been the approach of spring, when people usually begin spending more time in their cars. Gasoline inventories had been unusually large last fall and winter, said Fergus McLeod of the securities firm BT Alex. Brown. As inventories began to dwindle, gas prices began to rise. A decision by OPEC to pump less oil will likely trigger a further rise in gasoline prices by two to three cents a gallon for every additional dollar increase in the price for a barrel of oil, McLeod said.

Kevorkian acts as own lawyer in murder trial

By Justin Hyde
Associated Press

PONTIAC, Mich. — Acting as his own lawyer, Dr. Jack Kevorkian went on trial on murder charges for the first time yesterday and told a jury that like an executioner, he was merely carrying out his professional duty in a videotaped suicide shown on "60 Minutes."

Kevorkian was charged after he gave a lethal injection to a patient with Lou Gehrig's disease and dared prosecutors to do something about it.

Kevorkian said in his opening statement that he acted out of compassion for 52-year-old Thomas Youk and was no more culpable than an executioner.

"To have a crime, you need a vicious will and a vicious act," he said.

Prosecutor John Skrzynski objected, contending that Kevorkian was arguing law rather than summarizing his case. Judge Jessica Cooper agreed, and she briefly dismissed the jury to ask Kevorkian what he was trying to say.

"What I was trying to prove here is that I didn't have the intent to kill, just as the executioner doesn't," Kevorkian said. "His intent is to do his duty, because he may despise what he is doing. But he's forced to do it by his position."

Earlier, Kevorkian won the right to represent himself despite the misgivings of the judge, who asked him: "Do you understand you could spend the rest of your life in prison?"

"There's not much of it left," the 70-year-old Kevorkian said. After the ruling, 12 jurors and two alternates quickly were selected out of a pool of 80 people. The judge asked candidates whether they knew anyone who had suffered a terminal illness, and several people were dismissed after saying they had strong opinions about the case.

By his own count, Kevorkian has taken part in more than 130 suicides since 1990. He has been tried four times on assisted suicide charges, with three acquittals and one mistrial.

In Skrzynski's opening statement, the prosecutor said there was a key difference between those cases and this one.

"This is not an assisted suicide case," Skrzynski said. "Tom Youk did not kill himself with Jack Kevorkian's help. Jack Kevorkian killed Tom Youk by injecting him with drugs."

Kevorkian will be allowed to consult with lawyers David Gorosh and Lisa Dwyer during this trial but said that defending himself was "what I've planned all along."

Double parking leads to ODB's arrest

NEW YORK (AP) — Trouble-prone rapper ODB was arrested yesterday after police allegedly found three small containers of crack cocaine on him during a traffic stop in Brooklyn.

The Wu-Tang Clan rapper, whose real name is Russell Jones, was stopped by officers who saw a 1986 Range Rover without license plates, double-parked.

The driver did not have a license or registration, police said. When Jones, 30, gave his name, a record check revealed he had a suspended license and was wanted for failure to pay child support — leading to a search that turned up the drugs, Lt. Dennis Cirillo said.

Jones was in custody awaiting arraignment on misdemeanor drug charges. His attorney, Peter Frankell, did not immediately return calls for comment.

Last month, a Brooklyn grand jury decided Jones would not face attempted murder charges stemming from an encounter with officers who stopped Jones' car for allegedly not having its lights on. The officers said that when they approached the driver's window two shots were fired, and they shot back. No gun was found in the car. Jones was convicted of second-degree assault in New York in 1993.

He was arrested last month in Los Angeles when he parked in a no-parking zone and police found he was wearing a bulletproof vest. He has pleaded innocent to violating a law banning felons from wearing body armor.

Study says complaints not being investigated

WASHINGTON (AP) — Complaints of harm to nursing home residents often aren't promptly investigated by state authorities, says a new report from federal auditors.

Although the federal government provides most of the money to states for nursing home inspections, it has done little to ensure that complaints from families, residents and employees are responded to adequately, said the report, released yesterday by the General Accounting Office.

"Serious complaints alleging that nursing home residents are being harmed can remain for weeks or months," it said.

Responding in advance to the public release of the findings, the Clinton administration last week sent state inspection agencies a letter saying they must respond within 10 days to any complaint alleging harm to nursing home residents. In the past, inspectors had to meet a two-day deadline only in situations meeting the graver standard of posing "immediate jeopardy" to a resident.

The Health and Human Services Department also will distribute new posters, pamphlets and videos to help educate nursing home residents and their families about the new standards and how to file complaints. The materials are scheduled to be in nursing homes by May.

Six missing, feared dead after avalanche

TURNAGAIN PASS, Alaska (AP) — Volunteers with 10-foot poles repeatedly poked the snow yesterday in a search for the bodies of as many as six people who may have been swept off their snowmobiles in an avalanche that killed two others.

The 30-foot wave of powdery snow roared down the mountainside Sunday afternoon, while hundreds of snowmobilers enjoyed temperatures in the 40s and bright sunshine.

Two snowmobilers were found dead, and State Trooper 1st Sgt. Paul Burke said six others were thought to be missing, based on phone calls overnight from people reporting that friends or relatives hadn't returned.

The avalanche buried a grove of 10-foot-high spruce trees, and Burke said he fears some victims may be entangled in the uprooted trees.

Troopers also were analyzing a videotape taken by an eyewitness to try to pinpoint where some victims may be buried. The video shows several snowmobilers trying to outrun a part of the slide. They disappear in smoky clouds and aren't seen again.

About 85 volunteers moved shoulder-to-shoulder with the poles Monday, probing for bodies in areas where witnesses had reported seeing snowmobilers disappear or where machines had been discovered. Dogs trained to sniff out buried bodies accompanied searchers, but no signs of additional victims had been found by midday yesterday.

The avalanche extended nearly two miles across the face of a mountain high in Turnagain Pass, a popular recreation area in the Chugach National Forest about 55 miles southeast of Anchorage. It was the second of two slides that occurred about 20 minutes apart.

The avalanches may have been triggered by "highmarking," a contest in which snowmobilers drive straight uphill to see who can make the highest mark on the mountain, said Greg Wilkinson, a spokesman for the Alaska State Troopers.

Plutonium to be disposed by three utilities

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Energy Department yesterday awarded a $130 million contract to a consortium, including two U.S. utilities, for the disposal of plutonium by converting it into a fuel for civilian power reactors.

The department previously had announced its plan to get rid of about 36 tons of weapons-grade plutonium by converting it into a mixed oxide, or MOX, fuel that can be used in a civilian reactor.

The contract was awarded to the French nuclear fuel manufacturer, Cogema, and two U.S. utilities, Duke Power and Virginia Power Co., that will burn the MOX fuel in four of their reactors.

The first MOX shipments are expected to arrive at the reactors in 2007. A processing plant for converting plutonium to MOX fuel has yet to be built. Such a fuel is used in reactors in Europe and will be increasingly used in Japan soon. But the United States has not used such a fuel in civilian reactors because of a general policy against reactor fuel reprocessing.

The fuel to be used in the Energy Department program will come from processing plutonium left over from the weapons program. Critics have argued that the decision to use plutonium-based MOX fuel in civilian reactors will erode the sharp line historically separating U.S. military and civilian nuclear programs.

The Energy Department denies any such blurring of the separation of military and civilian programs. Senior department officials also have rejected suggestions by some critics that it is less safe to use MOX fuel than conventional uranium in civilian reactors. The Nuclear Control Institute, a private nuclear proliferation watchdog group, has criticized the use of MOX fuel in U.S. reactors, maintaining it will add to safety risks and contribute to proliferation concerns.

Envoy urges peace as war looms

By Katarina Kratovac

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — With NATO missiles and warplanes poised to strike, a U.S. envoy began a last bid yesterday to persuade Yugoslavia's president to accept a Kosovo peace plan and the thousands of foreign troops that would enforce it.

Otherwise, American envoy Richard Holbrooke said, "we are on the brink of military action."

Holbrooke held four hours of talks with President Slobodan Milosevic yesterday evening. He and the American envoy for Kosovo, Christopher Hill, then returned to the U.S. Embassy, diplomatic sources said, presumably to report by telephone to Washington. Further consultations between Holbrooke and Milosevic were expected early today, said White House press secretary Joe Lockhart.

In a brief report that gave no indication of any breakthrough, Serbian television said Milosevic told Holbrooke that "anybody who tries to impose a solution by force will have to face responsibility for moves against a peaceful policy and for consequences that may occur."

In Washington, President Clinton said there is "strong unity" among the United States and NATO allies to launch punitive air raids unless the Serbs agree to a settlement.

"We all agree we cannot allow President Milosevic to continue the aggression with impunity," Clinton said.

But in Moscow, Russia Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov again urged the United States and its allies not to unleash airstrikes against Yugoslavia.

"We are categorically against the use of force against Yugoslavia," Primakov told reporters a day before he was to head to Washington for meetings with Clinton. "We believe that political levers to influence the situation are far from being exhausted yet."

In the troubled province itself, fighting raged yesterday between government forces and the rebel Kosovo Liberation Army in the northern and central parts of the province. Several villages were ablaze and there were unconfirmed reports of mass killings near the town of Srbica.

Ethnic Albanians make up 90 percent of the 2 million inhabitants of Kosovo, a province of Serbia, Yugoslavia's main republic. Fighting broke out last year after Milosevic cracked down on ethnic Albanian separatists.

Since then, more than 2,000 people have been killed and hundreds of thousands have been fled their homes. At least 25,000 ethnic Albanians have fled since Saturday, U.N. officials said.

A second round of peace talks in France failed last week after Serbs refused to sign a U.S.-backed peace accord that gives the ethnic Albanians substantial autonomy. The plan also calls for 28,000 NATO troops — including 4,000 Americans — to supervise the accord.

In a letter read on state television, Milosevic criticized the Americans and their allies for the NATO threats and their handling of the peace negotiations.

"Your people should be ashamed, because you are getting ready to use force against a small European nation because it protects its territory against separatism and its people against terrorism," Milosevic was quoted as saying in a letter to the French and British foreign ministers.

"Surely but slowly it's going to start [becoming] a club. This is a long process," he said.

He couldn't give an exact date, but said the club would open soon by starting to only admit members. There will also be structural and operational changes such as adding an awning but Gomez would not elaborate on what exactly would be changing.

According to the bylaws of the club, it would be a non- profit organization whose members will have to have at least one parent, grandparent or great-grandparent that was not born in the United States.

The Planning Board had raised concerns that by only allowing individuals with non-native relatives, the club would be discriminatory against African Americans.

However, DeLong said during the Feb. 18 Board meeting that the point of the club existing is to provide a place for people of various ethnic and cultural backgrounds to meet and any racism from the bylaws was unintentional.

De-conn-struction

The seasoned traveller knows that to get from sunny Oreland, Pa. to supersexy Amherst one must pass through, unfortunately, Connecticut. Now there are ways around it, like driving up through New York and over or putting your car on a ship and sailing up the Atlantic coast, but both of these options are time-consuming, if tempting.

For ages, explorers have sought a better route. They've promised kings and queens gold and spices the likes of which have never been seen, but alas, they've come up empty-handed. Many explorers met their death trying to figure out the puzzle that is Connecticut. The great Vasco de Gama was heard to remark on his deathbed, "Connecticut. What a fing pickle."

Mike Messaros

I say, let's abolish Connecticut. Just do away with it. I mean, do we really need a state that's motto is "The magical land of pointless traffic jams?" This narrowly beat out the other suggested state mottoes: "Connecticut — a good place to shuffle off this mortal coil," or "Connecticut — the East Coast's rest area." Although I think the above-mentioned de Gama quote sums it up best:

"It's a state that slams on its brakes at the slightest provocation. You turn on the radio while stuck in the fifth traffic jam of your trip and the traffic report tells you "Well, up by exit 23, we have a dog by the side of the road, sniffing the guard rail. He's threatening at any moment to just walk out onto the road. Traffic is at a stand-still, and some drivers have taken to telling the dog, 'Shoo!' but it's doing little if any good. The state once again shakes its collective head and sighs 'What can we do?'"

And what a deceptive little state. You look at it on a map and think "Hmm, shouldn't take me more than an hour to get through." Then you're stuck in a traffic jam because everybody's leaving Milford for Alan's family night. Next thing you know, you're in Hartford five hours later, realizing the real reason the Whalers left.

Ronald, the old guy in the Campus Center who places bets for me, told me that Connecticut was founded by and named after Jimmy Connecticut III. But Ronald also tells me that the Washington Senators have a sweet baseball team this year. Regardless, Jimmy, I am told, just wanted a place to kick back, relax and let New York and Massachusetts do all the work. Call it a "hammock state," stretched between two real states.

Jimmy was not hard-working. He said his cash crop was "a little bit of shut-eye and a whole lot of cheap liquor." He was so lazy he didn't even pronounce the second "c" in his last name.

And the state's gotten a free ride for long enough, in my book.

The license plate says "The Constitution State," (I had a fair amount of time to check out license plates while waiting for drivers to gingerly avoid the plastic bag that had blown onto the highway) but I doubt that has anything to do with the actual constitution of these United States, but the fact that Jimmy Connecticut III could eat anything he liked without feeling sick. This might explain the fact that Connecticut has the highest ratio of Kenny Rogers' Roasters to people in the country.

So be gone with it. I'm sick of traffic jams and bad radio stations and Jai Alai (what is this, Miami Vice?). I'm done with North Haven and Branford and Stamford (not Stanford, but Stamford). It's time we just gave it the silent treatment. Next time someone mentions Connecticut, say "where?"

"Connecticut."

"Connecti-whozzits? What?"

"You know — the Constitution State."

"I'm sorry. You must be foreign or something. I can't understand a word you're saying."

It seems a shame that the legendary beauty of Atlantis had to sink into the ocean, while Connecticut remains untouched. Six of the seven wonders of the world have disappeared, with barely a trace, but the Bruce Museum off of exit 3 on Route 95 still inexplicably stands. (I imagine the museum being full of wax sculptures of famous Bruces: "To your left is Bruce Jenner, to your right, Lenny Bruce. We hope you enjoyed your visit and please tell your friends." I'm probably just romanticizing it.)

So let's just send the people of Connecticut out into this great nation, cast them out across this country like leaves upon the wind. Let's take their broken wings, teach them to fly again, learn to live so free. And hey, if they really want to live somewhere that only exists because of its neighboring states, then there's always New Jersey.

Mike Messaros is a Collegian columnist.

Race and class are intertwined

Editor's note: This is the first part of a two-part column.

While we applaud the University of Massachusetts for advocating policies that increase the numbers of students who are the first members in their families to attend college and policies that guarantee admission to many Massachusetts community college graduates — solid class-based affirmative action programs — we are saddened that the University seems poised to abolish race-based affirmative action.

Eliminating and/or decreasing the extent to which racial disadvantage can affect admissions and funding as well as other decisions has resulted in significant decreases in the number of minority students in other university communities.

The chancellor suggests that we'll keep the numbers of minority students as high as possible here at UMass by working harder to bring in a higher percentage of those who are accepted under a new policy. This strategy hasn't worked elsewhere, but we believe the chancellor is sincere in his hope that it will work here at UMass.

More important, however, are our doubts about a logic implicit in the chancellor's hopes for class-based affirmative action strategies. The chancellor implies that shifting away from equally vital race- and class-based policies toward a more singularly class-based policy will not have long-term deleterious effects on minority admissions or harm current and future minority students' ability to finance educations here at UMass. We wish his logic was supported by recent developments in the social science literature, but on both counts the literature suggests otherwise.

A number of recent works continue to point to the independent effects of race — that is, effects that operate above and beyond class — in determining the life chances of groups like African Americans, Latinos, Native Americans and Asians (especially Southeast Asians). Two award-winning books that are especially relevant are Douglas Massey and Nancy Denton's American Apartheid (1993) and Melvin Oliver and Thomas Shapiro's Black Wealth, White Wealth (1995), which examine how racial discrimination continues to limit the opportunities to which African Americans can gain access.

These books highlight at least three patterns that illustrate the additional burden that racial minorities face. Taken together, these patterns suggest that col-

> "This strategy hasn't worked elsewhere, but we believe the Chancellor is sincere in his hope that it will work here at UMass."
> Deirdre Royster and Dean Robinson

lapsing race-based affirmative action policies into class-based affirmative action policies places an undue burden on minority families.

Racial segregation patterns in the U.S. (and in Massachusetts) continue to result in minorities, especially African Americans and Latinos, living in less affluent communities in which schools lack not only accredited teachers, but more importantly many of the courses that are virtual pre-requisites for college admission. Minority students are unable to take as many advanced placement/enriched courses while in high school and lack access to many of the extracurricular opportunities such as French Club, Debate Team, and Model United Nations that help college students stand out.

In recognition of these and a host of related realities, the state of Massachusetts created the METCO program which buses inner city (mostly poor and minority) students to affluent suburban high schools for better schooling opportunities. Since there is always a long waiting list for the METCO program, many students are stuck in institutions which won't provide many of the advanced placement and intensive courses, extracurricular activities and clubs, or awards and recognition of academic excellence that UMass and other admissions officers will be looking for on college applications.

Trust, lies and the Internet

Perhaps some of you may remember the Internet romance that had begun to blossom for me last month. In short, after three months of writing and talking on the phone, a girl I had met in an Internet chat room had revealed romantic feelings to me in a letter.

I had responded to this with equally romantic words, and we had then agreed that I would come out to Chicago to meet her for the first time during Spring Break. Of course, I was excited as any person would be in this situation. With the conversations we had had and the letters we had sent, I had believed that the romance was potentially very exciting.

Jason Wiesenbach

However, I was completely deceived. Fortunately, though, I discovered this deception before making any trip. In reality, Cindy had a boyfriend while she was telling me she was falling for me. Upon speaking to her after I found out she was playing mind games with me, she told me the following: "I only wanted to fantasize about you, like I do with most guys. I never wanted to date you."

Painful, perhaps. But, the pain was very much alleviated by the next letter I received from her, displaying all of her immaturities in full glory. It seems as though I had hit on the positive points of her personality initially and had strangely missed all of her negative points.

I think this situation shows off one of the greatest drawbacks in developing an Internet-based relationship. While in a conventional romance, one can watch the other's actions to see if the feelings are mutual. In my situation, however, I had to base all of my thoughts upon her words.

In effect, the importance of trust is greatly magnified in a relationship in which one has never met the other. Each person can reveal truthfully or simply fabricate or exaggerate his or her personality and the other person will never know. Not that a person cannot lie in a conventional relationship, but when two people have never met, it is immensely easier to do.

Now, does this mean that I have rejected the Internet as a place to meet people? Absolutely not. I do not feel it would be intelligent to reject an entirely new medium simply because of one bad experience. The Internet to me is much like a personal ad combined with a meeting of strangers in a room full of strangers. My experience will instead make me wiser if Internet romance comes my way again.

Furthermore, while all of this deception was occurring, I had been e-mailing and writing letters to someone else I had met in another chat room in December. My meeting with Heather, however, was not one based around romantic beginnings, but around mutual friendship.

Though I did not initially put as much effort into developing my friendship with her as I was pursuing the failed romance with Cindy, my friendship with Heather quickly has grown, perhaps because of our conversations about my unfortunate romance.

So, instead of meeting Cindy under the guise of love, I drove out to a place near Pittsburgh to meet Heather. Neither of us could resist meeting one another, as our passionate friendship developed around the sharing of pure emotions and feelings, without any deception. I had only called her three times, but, unlike Cindy, I did not come upon any deception and did not visit her with any lingering fears.

But, I'm sure you want to know, since I did meet her this Spring Break, did she live up to all the expectations I had of her? She lived up to them and more, which were the same thoughts she expressed of me in her last letter.

But, how did the meeting itself go, considering this was all new for both of us? After waiting for her in a restaurant, she arrived with a gleaming smile, which I returned.

With a white and red rose for me in her hand, we did not say a word until we had hugged. Besides noticing her lingering nervousness, I saw that her eyes are much larger and more powerful than her pictures had led me to believe.

After a short lunch, we proceeded to Wal-Mart of all places. But, I feel it is there that she and I realized how alike we are. We showed each other our fun side, as we had a field day with all of the stuffed animals we could find. The two bears we later went home with became symbols of the emotions that we could not find words for, or perhaps did not want to express aloud.

Her mom had come along and was present throughout all of this; she became the recipient of some of the high energy we communicated and fed off of while I was there. Her mom even at one time described me as "a male version of Heather," showing just how similar we are.

Through constantly engaging conversations ranging from the supernatural to our passion for music and meeting her boyfriend and best friend, any remaining fears of each other disappeared completely. Even with the amount of talking we did those few days, she and I both know that the friendship has reached its potential depths.

> The Internet to me is much like a personal ad combined with a meeting of strangers in a room full of strangers.

It is impossible to discuss the conversations and emotions we each had in this article, but there is no doubt that she and I anxiously await the next time we can speak in person.

The entire experience seemed so natural, as though we had been friends before, perhaps in another life. Without the Internet, Heather and I may not have found each other in this one. Thus, as our friendship is real and we fully trust each other, it shows the Internet's positive possibilities just as conventional friendships with people can have.

Letters to the Editor

Straighten out your facts

To the editor:

This letter is in response to Michael Whitehouse's "Students Unite" editorial yesterday. Mr. Whitehouse, I fully applaud your call to students to make their voices heard this Wednesday and Thursday, but before you write a column and before you run for president, you should get your facts straight.

I authored the "Affirmative Action" (a misnomer) motion after the first not the second rally, which was tabled to committee for further discussion. I, along with many others including but not limited to Southwest Area Governor Michael Rosettie and Senators Asif Savani, Paul Ferro and Aaron Saunders, spent the next week discussing the issue. There were many hours spent in debate in an attempt to write a motion that would get unanimous support of the entire Student Senate (which is as rare as a tanning booth in Jamaica).

Unfortunately, our different beliefs could not find a common ground. I re-wrote my motion with stronger language and more demands, knowing that if I couldn't get the support of the full Senate, I might as well push for a more powerful motion. And quite unlike what you reported in your letter, the motion passed by a slim margin. I wish that the entire Student Senate could have been behind the motion, but some of us just plain old disagree. However, that motion is only a small piece of a much larger puzzle.

I know that there is a way for this University to meet its promise of 20 percent ALANA enrollment without violating the Bakke and Boston Latin decisions. Finding that way will require the input of students, professors, administrators and anybody else who has a stake in this issue. Most importantly, everyone is involved must have a willingness to work together to achieve a common goal. The University's decision warrants protest. A solution requires cooperation.

Mercury pollution a lesser known danger

By Natty Yagudin
Collegian Staff

If you ever wonder what is hidden in that mystery fish during dinner at the dining commons, your worries may be substantial.

According to a report published by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPirg), the average can of tuna in the United States contains high levels of mercury that exceed the safety standards set by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).

"A number one reason is that 68 percent of our rivers and streams are [generally] polluted," said Bruce Cortis of MASSPirg. "One hundred percent are polluted with mercury."

According to Cortis, there is a current advisory against eating fish from any pond in Massachusetts.

"The big question is where this is coming from. Mercury is found in industrial plants," said Cortis.

Bruce Cortis added oil and coal plants lobby the government to loosen environmental regulations.

"Right now, the Environmental Protection Agency does not give mercury [pollution] the respect it deserves," said Cortis.

Women of child bearing age are the most vulnerable group because of possible birth defects to newborns, according to MASSPirg.

Mercury is also known to be one of many highly poisonous substances harmful to the environment.

Some of the effects of mercury include damage to the central nervous system, kidney damage, immune system and child development.

"You need one gram [of mercury] to contaminate an entire lake," said Cortis.

Currently, the Western Massachusetts Electric Company, which operates a plant on Mount Tom, produces 75 to 100 pounds of mercury a year.

MASSPirg is working on a national campaign to raise public awareness of the problem.

"We're focused on the fact that nobody knows this," said Cortis. "The biggest thing that we're concerned about is that we are inheriting this world. We need to recognize that it's our jobs to recover some of the losses."

1998 was warmest year of the millennium, UMass scientists say

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

If you thought our snow-free winter was unusual, you were right.

University of Massachusetts global warming researchers have released a report suggesting that 1998 was the warmest year of the millennium.

The report is based on research conducted by a team of scientists from the University of Arizona and UMass, including UMass Geosciences Department Chair Raymond Bradley and senior post-doctoral resident associate Michael Mann. It concludes that not only was 1998 the warmest year of the millennium, but that the 1990s were the warmest decade.

"Temperatures in the latter half of the 20th century were unprecedented," said Bradley.

According to the report, these high temperatures were even more unusual considering temperatures have been gradually dropping for the past 1,000 years.

"The cooling trend of over 900 years was dramatically reversed in less than a century," said Mann. "The abruptness of the recent warming is key, and it is a potential cause for concern."

The research was conducted by the close examination of "proxy indicators," natural archives such as tree rings and ice cores, which record climate variations every year.

The scientists maintain that human-induced greenhouse gases have been a substantial factor in global warming.

According to Katherine Silverthorne of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group (U.S. Pirg) automobiles and industry are the primary cause of the recent rise in temperature.

In order to reduce global warming, U.S. PIRG recommends that the United States set standards for power plan carbon dioxide emissions, increase fuel economy standards for automobiles, increase funding for energy efficiency and renewable energy, cut fossil fuel subsidies, and ratify the Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement to decrease greenhouse gas emissions.

MASSPirg, the Massachusetts chapter of U.S. Pirg, has helped organize a statewide campaign called the Clean Air Initiative.

"We're focusing on getting Governor Cellucci to follow through on a promise to get our five dirtiest power plants under current clean air conditions," said Bruce Cortins, the chair of the UMass chapter of MASSPirg.

UMass and area high schools team up to address environmental issues

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Collaborating in an effort to address environmental issues, the University of Massachusetts recently held a two-day conference for approximately 26 high schools from across the state.

The 1999 Enviro-Trek conference, held last month, focused on learning more about environmental issues affecting our youth today.

The conference was sponsored by UMass Extension, a natural resources and environmental conservation group, and environmental organization, International Pulp and Paper.

More than 160 high school students visited 51 sites around campus in which faculty, students and staff talked about how UMass connects with environmental issues.

After visiting these sites, the students returned to the Campus Center Auditorium where they shared their knowledge with other students.

Sarah Spalding, coordinator of Earth Connection and the UMass Extension Program, feels UMass is an excellent means by which to educate students on the issues of the environment.

"The key is really giving them a chance to network and see UMass as a resource for how to start a project within their own community," Spalding said. "By discovering resources at UMass and from each other, they can be better environmental citizens."

Leading the Enviro-Trek around campus were UMass students like Julio Rivera, a junior English major, who felt a lot of students aren't aware of all the connections to the environment on campus.

"We looked for sites and professors and volunteers to host sites and give lectures on various issues involving the earth," Rivera said. "I was unaware there were so many things that are environmentally involved."

The groups travelled across campus to locations including the Power Plant, Durfee Conservatory and Earthfoods. Guest faculty and student lecturers spoke on environmental issues and how to become involved on the community level. Pioneer Valley Regional High School (PVRHS) student Lucy Damkoehler was impressed by the student involvement through groups like MASSPirg.

"It was interesting to find out about MASSPirg and what involvement they have on campus," Damkoehler said.

After lectures were held, the high school groups set up tables on the Campus Center Concourse and informed people of the issues they were working on and how everyone can get involved.

PVRHS student Hillary Szteliga felt the Enviro-Trek conference helped her realize how she could become involved with environmental issues within her own community.

Currently, she is working on getting Open Space Planning approved for all of the towns in Franklin County.

The Open Space Planning project is projected towards the preservation of public land for the use of wildlife conservation. Right now, there is no open space preserved in all of Franklin County and Szteliga is just one of the students in her community getting involved to make a difference.

"We go around and interview people and ask them how they feel about open space," Szteliga said. "Our town has grown considerably, and by preserving space we can stop the town from growing this much."

Szteliga referred to the incident last year in which her town knocked down neighborhood buildings and drained the local pond to build what is now Route 91.

"This could be a problem because there's woods everywhere," Szteliga said. "We have a lot to preserve."

The goal of Open Space Planning is to get open space approved. The Enviro-Trek conference made a big impact on helping her get involved within her own community, Szteliga said.

Dealing with toxic pollution in Western Massachusetts

By Veronica MacDonald
Collegian Correspondent

Woburn's problems with toxic waste pollution have been broadcast across America through the book and movie A Civil Action, but according to Stacia Falkowski the problem is just as serious in Springfield's Indian Orchard.

A member of Citizen's Against Pollution, a non-profit organization of Indian Orchard, Falkowski says Springfield has the highest amount of toxins used in Massachusetts. There are five major industries in Indian Orchard, three of which emit sulfuric acid into the environment. Of the total toxics emitted per year in Springfield, Falkowski says 227 million of the 263 million pounds are from Indian Orchard.

Falkowski is one out of seven Indian Orchard residents next to Unifirst Power Plant who has developed cancer. Falkowski alleges that Unifirst's toxic waste pollution are the cause of her cancer.

Investigations have determined the release of Trichloroethylene (TCE) into Dimmock Pond has come from Unifirst; the company has exposed the community to nuclear radiation by facing the plant's blowers towards homes.

The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) discovered multiple toxins in the soil in 1986 but clean-ups have not occurred, according to Falkowski.

Falkowski claims that other problems for the community include kids walking past Crane Company, a superfund site on their way to Warner School. The park and pond located next to Unifirst are highly contaminated, yet city officials have not prohibited fishing or children playing near the pond water. Dumping of toxic wastes into the pond has been documented, said Falkowski.

Falkowski said the National Cancer Institute found that childhood cancer has increased tremendously in recent years due to environmental causes. She also feels that "politicians and regulatory agencies have only been downplaying our problem" and toxic spills have not been cleaned up because they are considered to be "accidents."

Kevin Sheehan, licensed site professional for Environmental Compliance Services (ECS), was hired by Unifirst to oversee clean-up of the plant. Sheehan said that the TCEs released by Unifirst's industrial laundry facilities were a consequence of two unforseen accidents.

In the winter of 1993, a lint collector's cleaning water froze and its connecting pipes burst. These pipes on the roof overflowed and water overflowed to the parking lot and into the storm water system. This overflow along with other Springfield municipal water discharges into Dimmock Pond.

The following accident occured in 1995, when a fire in Unifirst's laundry facility caused firemen to wheeled carts of burning clothes into the parking lot and extinguish them. Again chemicals from the burning clothes found their way to Dimmock Pond through the runoff drains.

Sheehan and Jim Sweitzer, senior project manager of ECS, who was also hired to oversee Unifirst's clean-up, said both accidents were addressed in sediment removal of Dimmock Pond in 1996. Sheehan believes that 10,000 gallons of water removed and the removal of several feet of sediment from the western cove of Dimmock Pond was a sufficient clean- up of the problems of a long history of runoff in Springfield.

A Unifirst report from ECS stated: "Based on the characterizations of the site [Unifirst] and the exposure pathways or opportunities to come in contact with the site, it was determined that the site did not pose a significant risk to humans."

Western Mass. Activism

Allegations of toxic pollution in Springfield and Woburn are not the only areas voicing concerns. According to Eric Weltman, of the Toxics Action Center in Boston, several other areas in Western Massachusetts are facing similar situations. General Electric in Pittsfield released polychlorinatedbiphenyl (PCBs) in a waste site which in turn spilled chemicals into the Housatonic River. Citizens, in turn, want to hold GE accountable.

Jane Magee, manager [illegible] Electric's Pittsfield/Housatonic [illegible] Agreement, was a part of a meeting in September with the EPA and twelve other government [illegible] to create a comprehensive settlement to [illegible] Housatonic River. The spills and contamination occurred at the turn of the century when [illegible] was legal and the Housatonic ran through [illegible] Weltman claims that when PCBs were banned, [illegible] use. Magee also said this new settlement [illegible] milestone in government and industry [illegible] and involves both the community and Massachusetts [illegible] clean-up efforts.

Weltman mentioned cancer [illegible] occurring in Western Massachusetts. For [illegible] Woodhill has proposed a natural gas power plant [illegible] community is fighting against. Marion Weltman, [illegible] of Granby, stopped the dumping of [illegible] in Granby's landfill. Ashfield resident [illegible] continued the spraying of pesticides on her [illegible] towns in Northwestern Massachusetts. After her diagnosis of breast cancer four years ago, Carroll became a more determined activist fighting toxic pollution.

Mary Holland, the regional director of DEP, closed unsafe facilities throughout Western Massachusetts in 1997. She claims that four out of six medical incinerators, one of which belongs to UMass, were shut down. Dioxins from medical waste incinerators have been linked to female reproductive disorders, according to Weltman.

The Department of Environmental Protection (DEP) is responsible for regulations, permits, compliance and enforcement, assistance, and policies concerning land, air, and water. The DEP recently began an Environmental Results Program that makes heads of small companies accountable for emissions. This change includes companies that were historically not under DEP's regulation, such as printing companies, laundry, and photo processors. The Toxics Use Reduction Institute is also searching for alternatives to toxins like TCEs.

Bob Crossland, a MassPirg campus organizer at Amherst College, acknowledges that the Tosics Use Reduction Act of 1990 has reduced toxic emissions by 73 percent, or 15.1 million pounds. And the Right to Know Act [illegible] voluntarily reduce emissions if exceeded because companies would have to report everything they emit. However, only 9 percent of mercury emissions are required for report currently. And only six hundred of the 75,000 chemicals in existance are reported.

Crossland feels that all toxic chemicals should be reported, along with where they came from, what communities they are trasported through, and what chemicals are found in our workplaces and the products we use. To effect change, Crossland suggests simple things like writing letters to legislators and making public comments.

Unaware of a specific source of toxic contamination, Peggy Wolff of the Environmetal Health Coalition of Massachusetts allegedges that she has suffered a [illegible] of chemical exposure and knows first hand about long-term consequences. Wolff suffers from Multiple Chemical Sensitivities (MCS). People with MCS need to avoid toxic chemicals at all costs to [illegible] it. Wolff built a non-toxic home eats organic [illegible] and wears chemical free clothing.

The disorder is [illegible] difficult, but she claims that "hazardous substances are found seemingly [illegible] where in our modern day world." For example, MCS sufferers must avoid most personal care, cleaning and laundry products. In addition, chemicals like in carpets, [illegible] furniture, mattresses, painters, pesticides, [illegible] fume, gas, oil and wood. Like cancer and asthma, the incidance of MCS is on the rise but the American Medical Association has not informed practitioners about it.

Wolff said recovery is possible, but most people who suffer from MCS commit suicide.

Wolff feels as far as toxic activism is concerned, awareness is not enough — the public must have incentive. The moral of her story is that "like canaries in the coal mines, people with chemical sensitivities and MCS are trying to send a message to those not yet affected, but who would later."

Surprises, emotion rule at the Academy Awards

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

A writer who's been dead for 400 years and an effervescent Italian were the big upset winners at the 71st annual Academy Awards Sunday night, a ceremony marked by too many tributes, too many costumes and too many bad jokes. As always, the greatest moments came at the end of the four-hour long telecast — a surprise victory for Shakespeare in Love and Italian writer/director/actor Roberto Benigni.

Moments after Steven Spielberg accepted the Best Director Oscar for Saving Private Ryan, Shakespeare in Love took home the top prize for Best Picture, marking only the 17th time in Oscar history that the two top awards didn't go to the same film. Shakespeare won the war against Spielberg's battlefield opus, capturing seven Oscars to Ryan's five.

In another considerable upset, Life is Beautiful's Roberto Benigni beat the likes of Tom Hanks, Nick Nolte and Ian McKellan for the prestigious Best Actor award. Benigni, for better or worse, was the star of the night. In accepting his two awards (he won for Best Foreign Language Film as well), the Italian leaped over chairs and spurted mountains of highly energetic, broken English to the confused crowd.

Hollywood types, like Jim Carrey (in a hilarious monologue), could only make fun of or bow down to the ever-happy Benigni. It marked the first time an actor in a foreign language film has won Best Actor, matching Sophia Loren's Oscar for Best Actress in the foreign film Two Women.

And if you stayed up long enough to see it, 25-year-old Gwyneth Paltrow gave a heartwarming, emotional speech upon winning the award for Best Actress.

Unfortunately, the rest of the Oscar telecast was devoid of any intrigue whatsoever. The Academy Awards always run long, so what inept producer decided to cram in a million tributes to such random things as Hollywood westerns? At one point, even Senator John Glenn took the stage and introduced a segment on Hollywood heros that seemed more like a history lesson than entertainment.

Host Whoopi Goldberg was both the perfect foil and the worst instigator of such ceremony flaws. Her best work was wearing a horde of costumes from each of the films nominated for best costume design. It was an amazing feat of courage and patience, especially considering the outfit from Velvet Goldmine featured peacock feathers.

Goldberg fell flat early, relying too much on political, bawdy humor and forced word play. She also laughed at her own jokes far too much. But as the night progressed,

Urban pop versus hip–hop style

David Katzoff

Just to set the record straight... the purity in the words "hip–hop" have recently taken on an entirely new meaning. Hip–hop has become the categorical soundscape for all urban-ized musical endeavors and consequently, artists such as Dru Hill, Usher, Harlem World and The Roots are mentioned in the same breath, as if the music they respectively bring forth is similar.

It's not.

But according to commercial publications, music programmers, pop radio disk jocks and MTV's infamous "Hip–Hop Week," this would appear to elicit truth. The ever- increasing misconceptions between the candy–coated, gum– popping sexual moments of modern R&B and the organic, rhythmic verbal graffiti of true hip–hop have resulted in an ignorance of the elemental culture.

Sprite commercials aside, there is a flagrant conceptual blurring of urban pop and hip–hop exemplified by nationwide media. Rap music has finally woven itself into the fabric of popular society, but it has inadvertently dragged with it the syrupy sounds of sappy songs sung by second–rate singers, ultimately sucking the substance from the surreal styles of street symbolism.

Hip–hop has grown up in–and–of–itself, thank you, and does not need the company of R&B to gain acceptance in the national spectrum of music. If MTV was really dedicated to its "Hip–Hop Week," then why were we watching TLC's all–time favorite videos? Why does Newsweek constantly refer to Blackstreet, Brandy and Mya as hip–hop artists? Why in Entertainment Weekly do we see Lauren Hill, Eminem and The Roots holding prominent spots in the R&B charts? Hmm.

Anyway, R&B and hip–hop (and even rap) are often vastly different and should be distinguished as such. Although attributing rigid categories for each artist/group with an urban aesthetic can be a dubious task, there must be some way to acknowledge the difference between Dru Hill, Harlem World and The Roots. Frankly, worldwide media sources such as Newsweek, MTV and Entertainment Weekly should begin to make that distinction. ????????(Go'on and marinate on that fo' a minute...)????????

On a lighter note, my five most flammable songs of the week goes as follows:

5) "A Part of My Life" Bumpy Knuckles
4) "Dream Shatterer (Rmx.)" Big Pun w/ Buckwild
3) "Beatnuts Forever" Beatnuts
2) "Quiet Storm" Mobb Deep
1) "You Got Me (Rmx.)" The Roots

DeNiro, Crystal rescue Analyze This

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

ANALYZE THIS
Directed By Harold Ramis
with Robert DeNiro, Billy Crystal
Lisa Kudrow
Playing at Showcase Cinemas

Analyze This is a strange composition, perhaps best described as a mixture of Donnie Brasco, Goodfellas and Naked Gun. Despite the obvious attempts at a full–blown, untraditional comedy, the movie definitely has the underworkings of other mob movies.

Although the choice not to do a full satire was probably a wise one, Analyze This does play off the tough–guy, dark tone of its more serious predecessors. Unfortunately, this (pardon the pun) is a one–trick pony. Making the tough guy appear sentimental and weepy works once or twice, but the movie has nothing left to back it up. Eventually, it gets lost in a slew of lame gags and hideous "knock–knock" caliber jokes.

The refreshingly original premise — that of a New York mob boss who needs a psychiatrist to help him cure his anxiety attacks — peters out quickly behind some unfunny psycho–babble.

Sure, the contrast between the extreme reluctance of the mild–mannered psychiatrist, Ben Sobol, and the forcefulness of goodfella Paul Vitti is engaging at first, but fleeting. How many times can the mob interrupt Sobol's wedding before the audience says "so what?" The whole "Odd Couple" effect wears out quickly, when the psychiatrist actually starts treating the misguided mobster.

The problem is traced back to the murder of the latter's father, also a member of the crime family before his death. This discovery should be ample warning of the unnecessary sentimentality to follow. The movie drags further as the plot for Vitti to avenge his best friend's death is dragged out. Needless to say, this is not very funny material.

The fault does not lie with the actors either. O.K., so Lisa Kudrow, who plays the reluctant wife, is more annoying and whining than her ditsy character, Phoebe, on Friends.

Robert DeNiro, however, is brilliant. DeNiro, the ultimate tough guy, brags and swaggers as a true mobster should. He exudes confidence in the role and adds unique elements of his past roles to the part. The audience is so accustomed to seeing DeNiro as the tough guy, the action hero, that his emotional breakdown and departure from previous stereotypes is extremely funny. DeNiro seems like a little kid trapped in a mobster's body.

Billy Crystal is perfect for the humble psychiatrist role opposite DeNiro. The on–screen chemistry between the two veteran actors is smooth and glib. Crystal's physical scrawniness and natural insecurities play well off DeNiro's commanding presence. Plus, unlike his other role's, Crystal does not have to carry the comedic role — DeNiro does that — which allows him to tone down his usually forced performance. Crystal plays the second banana well.

The blame for the low points squarely lies in the wishy- washy writing of Analyze This. When Crystal impersonates a goodfella at a mobster meeting, it is undoubtedly a moment of unequaled hilarity. And when DeNiro turns the tables to analyze Crystal, it is equally brilliant. However, these moments seem few and far between.

The movie is all too inconsistent and at times seems more like the HBO series The Sopranos than What About Bob? — the ultimate psychiatrist/patient movie. In fact, Analyze This brings to mind the simple–minded comedy of another ex–comedian turned actor, Robin

Blondie comeback hits sour note

COURTESY INTPN NADJALLA

Reunited New–Wave group Blondie's latest release No Exit doesn't match up to their classic earlier efforts.

NO EXIT
Blondie
Beyond

Here is a bittersweet return to the music world. The "original beat club underground sex goddess icon" is back with the rest of her band (arguments cleared up and lawsuits dropped) to release an LP of all new material.

We must pause here to consider if this is a good idea.

It's understandable that Deborah Harry and Co. want to avoid becoming a retro act, but most of the fun and songwriting brilliance is absent on No Exit. The band seems to be grasping desperately for something that is lost, but not necessarily gone forever.

Blondie was/is one of the most successful bands to come out of the post–punk era, and arguably one of the most important American bands of this era (The Talking Heads are their only competition for this title). Since their first album in 1976 they have produced some of the greatest hits of the late 70s/early 80s, while retaining their ties to the New York City underground scene where their roots were so deeply planted.

Blondie broke up in 1984 due to the pressures of stardom. Harry and Chris Stein's relationship under constant scrutiny, and creative differences, only to partially reunite two years ago. With legal battles over, Blondie (consisting of Harry, Stein, Jimmy Destri and Clem Burke) has been able to re– group, write and cut an album of entirely new material. Thus we have, No Exit.

From the opening track "Screaming Skin," we get some kind of idea what we're in for. Blondie is obviously trying to cash in on every genre of music that has been popular in the past five years. "Screaming Skin" is Blondie's ska experiment.

The band has found success in the past by bringing alternate musical genres into a mainstream pop song. Reggae ("The Tide Is High") and rap ("The Rapture") are just a few examples (Debbie Harry was the first white rapper. The Beastie Boys were still a hardcore–punk band when "The Rapture" came out). But the ska boat has already left and Blondie wasn't on it.

Other songs manage to sound like authentic Blondie, but are usually mediocre at best, such as "Forgive and Forget," "Out in the Streets" and "Happy Dog." While other tracks are just plain horrible. "The Dream's Lost on Me" is a earsore of a country song, and the title track should have been called "The Rapture part II starring Coolio." They couldn't have even gotten a good rapper to appear on their album.

There are bright spots, though. No matter how few. "Maria" is the first dose of decent songwriting on this album. "Double Take" and "Everything is Real But the Girl" are also tracks that fare well.

Harry must be given some credit also. She still looks and sounds as sexy as she did in 1978 when Parallel Lines was released. She manages to give even the most boring songs an air of sensuality. No Exit ends just about as bland as it began with a failed attempt to evoke world music. "Dig Up the Conjo."

This album is for the people who have gotten overly excited in anticipation of the next Blondie record, and are not concerned with quality in the slightest. I, myself was excited, but wound up disappointed. I wonder if I can trade in the CD for a vinyl copy of the "Heart of Glass" single. C–

Williams: just tell a million pithy jokes and one of them is bound to get a laugh sooner or later.

Analyze This feigns to be a witty, original comedy, but ends up being nothing more than a tribute to psychotherapy, the very thing it tries to satire. The original character contrasts and misunderstandings quickly devolve into a monotonously repetitive pattern. You can almost see what jokes are coming before they're told.

During certain moments, the movie borders on becoming a serious drama, which was not the desired effect. Only a charismatic DeNiro and a less sappy Crystal save the movie from complete disaster. C+

the more comfortable and witty she became. Self–deprecating humor helped, too — at one point she said, "I bet you're all missing Billy right now."

The biggest controversy of the evening turned out to be not much controversy at all, as Elia Kazan accepted an honorary Oscar without much resistance. Kazan, of course, was famous for naming names in the McCarthy era, ushering in a period of Hollywood blacklisting, and some in Hollywood had argued against the choice.

But when Kazan came on, most of the audience stood up and clapped, and Kazan acknowledged the controversy as he commented, "I think I'll just slip away now."

Short but powerful tributes were also made to director Stanley Kubrick and singer Frank Sinatra, both of whom have passed away.

Another slight upset occurred in the Best Supporting Actor category, as James Coburn took home the gold for Affliction over favorites Ed Harris and Billy Bob Thornton. Dame Judi Dench, despite having only eight minutes of screen time, won for her role as Elizabeth I in Shakespeare in Love.

All in all, however — after one weaved through all the tributes and the boring speeches — Oscar night was glamorous and emotional, complete with all the stars and all the surprises one could hope for.

UM men's gym tear down Owls

By Gary Mendese
Collegian Staff

While most of the campus was basking in the sun or just taking a seven-day breather from classes, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team was hard at work last week, and it added yet another victory to its growing list.

The nationally–ranked No. 10 team went head–to–head with the Southern Connecticut Owls last Thursday and walked away with a win, 221.950–200.700.

The star for the Minutemen was senior captain Stephen Pryor, who won three individual events and the all–around, leading UMass to a crushing win over the Owls. Pryor scored a 56.000 in the all–around, while winning the high bar (9.50), parallel bars (9.35), and tying for first on the pommel horse (9.55).

Sophomore Bryan McNulty won two events for the Minutemen, scoring a career–high–tying 9.70 on the floor exercise and taking the vault title with a 9.60. Senior Dan Young won the still rings (9.65) to close out the UMass sweep, and also finished with a pair of second place finishes on both the vault (9.35) and a career–high score on floor with a 9.65.

Senior Phil Lieberman grabbed the second–place spot on high bar (9.30) and a third–place tie on both the floor exercise (9.50) and vault (9.15) while sophomore J.J. Hershey finished third on the parallel bars (9.05).

Junior Jeff LaVallee stayed out of the all–around competition this meet and placed third on the floor exercise with a score of 9.50. Representing the new blood for the Minutemen, freshman Matt Plumser took home the third– place spot on the pommel horse with a score of 9.35.

This marks one of the last meets for the gym team, as there is only one more guaranteed competition for UMass this season: the ECAC championships to be held at the William D. Mullins Center this Friday and Saturday. If the squad takes the first–place spot at this meet, it will advance to NCAA Regionals, which are to be held in Champagne, Ill on April 10.

The Minutemen have never made it to Regionals before, so with a victory at ECACs, UMass history could be made.

Women's gym comes up short

Unlike many of the college students who traveled to warmer climes this past week, the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team found no comfort in the California sun. The team dropped two meets to fall to 9–6 on the season.
